THE obstructive party in matters of religious freedom and equality have, fortunately, a knack of making their concessions too late. Almost any time these twenty years they might have "saved" the Irish Church—according to their ideas of ecclesiastical salvage—by fairly proposing a levelling-up process, but they only found out that this was the true solution of the difficulty when the tide had turned unmistakably and irresistibly against all establishment whatever, and the result of their tardiness is a change more comprehensive than, a few years ago, the boldest political speculator would have dared to hope for. And yet this is the moment—when the eyes of England are opened as never before to the necessity of fairness and justice in dealing with these old ecclesiastical anomalies—for us to be treated to an offer of compromise and "concession" on the question of opening the Universities to the nation irrespective of church and creed. Hitherto the House of Lords has simply negatived from year to year the measures which have been sent up to it by constant increasing majorities of the Commons. This year the bill, passed by larger majorities than ever, was summarily thrown out by the Peers on the first reading, on the ground that Lord CARNARVON would be prepared next Session to propose a compromise on the subject. Lord CARNARVON's proposal is,—1, that one-half of the Fellowships should be handed over to the Universities, and that the holders of these University Fellowships should be absolutely free from all restriction or test; 2, that the remaining Fellowships should be retained by the colleges and held under the same restrictions as at present. This is little more than a variation of the idea thrown out last year by Dr. PUSEY in a letter to the President of the Wesleyan Conference. He then suggested that a definite portion of the surplus income of the colleges should be given up for the founding of separate undenominational colleges or University Fellowships for other religious denominations, "with the view of retaining the colleges themselves as places of education for the laity or future clergy of the Church of England." He now explains in a letter to the Guardian, that what he "proposed to surrender was income which is at present wasted."

"It is well known that a proportion of our Fellowships are simply a sinecure endowment of persons who have obtained a good class, chiefly in the littera humaniores school, and who, upon a required year of residence, at most, enjoy their sinecures away from the University, without having done anything for the University or colleges to which they are elected. This is, of course, mere waste. We should lose nothing, we should probably gain, by the abolition of such sinecures. Accepting then, as a fact, that, since the Church of England had lost so many of her people, it is virtually settled that she shall forfeit a proportion of her endowment, I was willing to accept 'denominational endowments.'"

We are much obliged both to Lord CARNARVON and Dr. PUSEY for their proposals, but especially because we regard them as signs of approaching victory to the principle which is greater than any such concessions. A generation ago we might have been thankful to have seen any chance of winning such an instalment of the long-deferred rights of Nonconformity. But no such proposals were then heard of, nor would they be heard of now except under the pressure of greater changes that can no longer be staved off. In a word, they are a concession not to justice, but to fear. They are the clumsy device of an old vested wrong conscious that its last hour is approaching. Even regarded from the point of view of the proposers they would be suicidal, for the new Colleges and Fellowships, untrammelled by any restrictions, must inevitably attract the pick of the students of England. Many of these, from University, Owens, and other Colleges, already furnish some of the foremost names in the honours' lists; they enter the competition in face of every discouragement, and hold their own. How many more would do so if the discouragements were taken away, and a half or a third of these brilliant rewards of scholarship and helps to a scholarly career were thrown freely open? A resident tutor of Oxford, Mr. J. R. THURSFIELD, puts this point very forcibly in the following passage in a letter to the Pall Mall Gazette:

"The new college, composed of not less than a hundred university fellows, elected by a competition freer than any which at present exists, could not fail to overshadow in a few years the existing foundations, to absorb into itself most of the ability of the university and a great proportion of its teaching power, so that before the end of the century the existing colleges would have vanished from the scene as completely as the forgotten halls of the middle ages. It is notorious at present that the demand for tuition in the universities is greatly in excess of the supply, and it may, therefore, be inferred with certainty that the great majority of the teachers would ultimately be found in the ranks of the university fellows. I know that it is not proposed to incorporate these fellows as a college, but the advantages of united action among them would so soon make themselves felt that for all practical purposes they would wield a power equal to that of the colleges; they might for convenience become incorporated, and I have therefore not scrupled to call them a college."

It is not, therefore, because we are afraid that such compromises would leave us under any disadvantage that we utterly repudiate them. It is that they would be a giving up of the principle for which we have been all along contending. They would still perpetuate the old obnoxious distinctions between Church and Dissent; and what Nonconformists are contending for is that these distinctions shall be entirely done away with, and that all religious parties shall stand upon a footing of absolute equality in the nation's ancient seats of learning. This is now all that we care to argue about, and the only thing to which we can listen. The time for compromises has gone by. The debates on the Irish Church have brought out into unexpected prominence the principle that Church property—and a fortiori it is true of University property—is simply national property. And as national property these universities must henceforth be regarded. Nor are the changes in this direction likely to be confined to Oxford and Cambridge. The Board of Trinity College, Dublin, have for years been obstinately setting themselves against several small concessions which the Liberal party have claimed. But the lesson of the Irish Church has already told upon them, and it is understood that they are now preparing to throw open their Fellowships to Nonconformists and Catholics. It is well. The old song tells how, long ago, at the advent of St. Patrick, the panic-stricken snakes "committed suicide to save themselves from slaughter." We commend the example to all old abuses of intolerance and exclusion. The "happy despatch," when executed with promptitude and courage, is not without a certain gracefulness. But let us have no more talk about concessions!

THE LIBERATION SOCIETY AND THE IRISH CHURCH ACT.

THE Liberator for July ably exposes the shameless way in which the Record, "ignoring the facts of current history, in a manner that is almost peculiar to that journal," attempts to fasten on Dissenters, by implication, the policy of endowing Roman Catholicism in Ireland.

"In a review of Mr. Mackenzie's 'History of the Inquisition in South America,' the Record asks, 'Are Scottish Presbyterians and English Dissenters really prepared to endow, out of the spoils of a Protestant Church, a system which produces such results?' The proper question to put would have been, 'Are members of the Established Church really ready to do this?' All through England and Scotland not a voice was raised by Dissenters, or Presbyterians, in favour of the system of concurrent endowment. The only support of that proposal came from the members of the Record's own Church. On any occasion that the Lords voted upon the question, its supporters were composed exclusively of English Establishmentarians, led on by two English Archbishops. Not a single English or Scotch Nonconformist member of the House of Commons voted in its favour. Not one newspaper representing Nonconformist views supported it. But the majority of Church newspapers including the Standard, the Guardian, the Church Review, and the Church News, wrote in its favour. After this we are coolly asked, 'Are Scottish Presbyterians and English Dissenters really prepared to endow, out of the spoils of a Protestant Church, a system which produces such results?' Let the Record ask the more pertinent question—What would have happened but for the recent protests of these two parties?"

The Executive Committee of the Liberation Society have published a Minute, in which they express the satisfaction and gratitude with which they regard the complete accomplishments of the Society's objects in one part of the United Kingdom, by the passing of the Act for the disestablishment of the Irish Church. They regard the event as the result of various concurring causes, and of the labours of many individuals, both in past and recent times; while they express a deep sense of obligation to Mr. Gladstone for the ability and conscientiousness with which he has brought the controversy to a close, as well as admiration of the fidelity with which he has been supported by his colleagues, and the liberal party generally. They further express an earnest hope that the beneficial effects of the measure may be seen in the improved condition of Ireland, and that the disestablished Church may so wisely use its liberty as to beget in the churches still established by law, a desire to enjoy the like freedom.

HERESY HUNTING IN SCOTLAND.

To those persons who are disposed to notice the tendencies of the age, it is apparent that Scotland is on the eve of a new reformation. Ministers and people in the Presbyterian body are asserting the need of revision in the standards.

A few weeks since a rumour appeared in the Dundee Advertiser that two Presbyterian laymen in the small town of Cupar-Angus had been suspected of holding views upon the infallibility of the Scriptures, the doctrines of original sin, the trinity, the vicarious atonement, and future punishment, contrary to the teaching of the confession of faith.

The Free Church minister (Presbyterian) visited the suspected persons in the usual manner, and during his visit he discovered that these two gentlemen did not hold correct views upon the subjects above referred to.

The Kirk Session summoned the offending members to appear before it. One only did this, the other objecting to appear at so short a notice. A long protest was read by the alleged heretic against the attempt to try him for heresy in private, and before he could answer the questions intended to test his belief in the above mentioned doctrines, he demanded an open court. As to his holding views different from the confession of faith, he asserted that the minister himself had preached the preceding Sunday to the effect that salvation was possible for all men; yet the confession of faith declared the number to be limited of those who might be saved. He asserted that no church had the right to make essential what Jesus did not make so. The Kirk Session, evidently puzzled, determined to apply to the Presbytery for advice. In the meantime, the Dundee Advertiser published the whole of the protest and arguments presented by the "heretic." "A leader" appeared in the same paper strongly in favour of the heretics. The proceedings of the minister were denounced as being full of the spirit of the inquisition. Several letters appeared, most of them strongly biased in favour of the men accused, in which it was further maintained that Presbyterians had the right of private judgment—at all events laymen had. The ministers, it was affirmed, might be reasonably bound to preach certain dogmas but the laity ought not to be compelled to believe them. Others asserted that the Free Church of Scotland was governed by rules, and that when a person became a member of that church it was understood that he would submit to the rule of the Kirk Session. Last week the Presbytery met at Blairgowrie, and the offending members were summoned to appear; one only did so, the same person who presented himself before the Kirk Session.

He was again allowed to speak for himself, and he reiterated his claim to the right to hold his own opinions, and still remain a member of the Free Church. As far as one can judge, the result will be the expulsion of the two laymen unless they should imitate the example of the Revs. Norman Macleod and Walter E. Smith, and qualify and modify their heresy to suit the demands of their judges.

However, the effect has been very great upon the community, the newspapers have opened their columns, and a warm controversy has been going on. On Sunday night the Rev. George Gillilan, who represents the broad church party among the United Presbyterians, referred to the case in a lecture. Mr. Gillilan frequently gives utterance to sentiments under the form of suggestions, and usually in the subjunctive mood, which might be dangerous if more positively affirmed.

He took very strong ground in favour of the two laymen, and asserted that in 99 cases out of a 100 the laity of the Presbyterian Church have not read the standard of the church with which they unite themselves.

There is a wide spread sympathy developed in favour of a wider liberty than has hitherto been enjoyed, and the Kirk Session of Cupar-Angus has started a question which it is not in the power of its members now to control.

AMERICAN NOTES.

S. Austin, writing from San Francisco of Starr King's grave, says:

"He feeling toward him on this whole coast cannot be described, it is so tender, strange, and deep. There is nothing at the East to which it can be compared, and only those who know this wild Pacific life can understand it. One of the giant trees of Mariposa bears his name, and a regal dome of the Yosemite is called Starr King. One of the Colfax party, on their recent visit, writes, 'He is the saint of the Pacific shore! Ever since the day when the young Unitarian clergyman died, and the legislature and all the courts adjourned, when the national authorities fired minute guns in the bay, while all the flags in the city and on the ships hung at half mast, a softer and a richer halo has been surrounding his memory, and many a poor cast-away now clings to his belief in Starr King as his only link to virtue.' To his own people here he is a departed friend; to loyal hearts everywhere he is the one man whose eloquence saved California in the Union; and to the wild and reckless wanderers of these Pacific states, with his great warm heart, and his eloquent words of the mercy of God, he is the one just man they have ever known, whose life was pure and whose words were hope."

The Nation has the following:

"Filiu Burritt, who has in his day done some honour to the American name, and some service to his race, has been for some time Consul at Birmingham, on a salary of $1,500, out of which he had to pay office-rent and clerk-hire, leaving him about $500 for his own use. One would think the place would not tempt the poorest harpy that ever 'worked' in a canvass, and yet the old man has been turned out. What makes the performance seem at first sight more remarkable is, that Burritt rendered great service to the Union cause with his pen during the war."

A new religious sect, called the "Brethren of One Faith," met in Chicago on the 6th of last month. The name will be very appropriate, says a Chicago paper, so long as the church has only one member.

In reality, however, according to the Chicago correspondent of the Liberal Christian, the "One Faith" resolves itself into almost as many articles as a Westminster catechism, before it is made fully explicit as a guide. The first article says that "men can only be saved by an intelligent belief of the Gospel," which allows some latitude apparently, were it not followed by an elaboration of what that intelligent belief must be, which deprives it of the designation intelligent, and reduces it to an arbitrary creed at once. They believe in a literal and visible theocracy, to be established upon the earth, and that the kingdom will consist of the restored tribes of Israel, who will be located in Palestine. Jerusalem is to be rebuilt in splendour, and become the metropolitan city of the world. Christ is to be the chief ruler or king over the whole earth. This millennium, however, is only to continue one thousand years. At the end of that time all names not in the Book of Life will be blotted out and the earth inhabited by a race of immortal beings. They reject the Trinity, Endless Punishment, Personality of the Devil, and many other orthodox views, but they plant themselves on the ground of infallibility as squarely as any strong old sect with a great long ancestry of church history to back it, and say the multitudinous faiths of Christendom cannot be of God, because they are not a unit. The Bible speaks only of one faith, and theirs is that faith.

The Rev. W. Knott, for a short time a student in our Home Missionary Board, and who recently graduated at the Meadville School, has been ordained to the ministry, by the Universalist Conference of Upper Canada, at Orono, about fifty miles east of Toronto.

We regret to learn that a daughter of the Rev. Henry Giles, formerly minister of the Park Chapel, Liverpool, has been drowned by the upsetting of a boat, at Bucksport, Me. She was eighteen years of age, and is said to have been highly educated and accomplished.

The Spectator having said that "no woman has ever founded a creed," S. J. B. writes to remind our contemporary that the statement is not quite accurate, since the considerable sect of Shakers owes its existence to Ann Lee, who in the last century promulgated its doctrines and was constituted its prophetess, and he adds:

"Here are now in America several Shaker settlements, comprising some thousands of members, who live in different 'families' presided over by elders, and occupied with the tillage of land, various branches of manufacture, and especially the cultivation of medicinal plants. No one who, like myself, has passed a week among them will withhold a tribute of respect to their industry, their simple hospitality, and the kindly gentleness with which, while maintaining the superior purity of their own creed, they extend the hand of fellowship to those 'of the world' who visit their secluded retreats. Their domains are usually remarkable in the surrounding country for their excellent cultivation and general air of prosperity, all possessions being vested in the elders for the common interest of all members. If the bright vivacity of family life is wanting, the pervading air of peaceful calm is very noticeable, and, even while realising that it falls short of the highest ideal, the visitor is struck with the 'starlit quiet,' which forms so marked a contrast to the rush and turmoil of life in the surrounding American towns, and which, combined with the interest of healthful labour, gives a result at least far superior to that of ordinary monastic life."

The Washington letter of the Liberal Christian has this:

"At the recent meeting of the Unitarian Society of this city, held after the morning service, the resignation of the Rev. Wm. Sharman was accepted by a vote of 20 to 9. Large numbers of the society have gone north for the summer, and not half of the pewholders of the church were present. We feel sorry to part with Mr. Sharman, for he has been an active, earnest, and faithful minister here during the past year. He leaves us with the good wishes of all members of the Unitarian Society who are loyal to the Government and the flag of their country. The disloyal element in the church forced him to tender his resignation, and have done all in their power while he has been here to make it uncomfortable for him. The same element quarrelled with Mr. Conway and Mr. Channing, and would do so with an angel from heaven, if one should ever drop down among us. The same element closed the Unitarian church in 1865, and declared that it was dead, and had better be sold out to the Congregationalists. The same element sigh daily for the good old days when slavery existed here, and the Unitarian bell was tolled by a slave instead of a freedman; and wonder why a Unitarian minister cannot be found to sympathise with them. They are shocked at the fact that when their brethren at Charleston, S. C., a few months before the war broke out, advertised for a pro-slavery Unitarian minister, to the credit of the denomination be it said, not one could be found in America so recreant to our national and religious ideas as to offer his services at any price. The same element drove the coloured Sunday-school out of the Unitarian church here, because the children were black, shutting the doors against them on a bitter cold December day in 1867. The same men declared that notices of the Christian Union, an organisation composed of the young men of the Unitarian church, should not be read in the pulpit, because this Union conducted coloured Sunday-schools, educated freedmen, and clothed and fed the destitute."

HENRY CRABB ROBINSON'S "DIARY."

IV.

For Flaxman, the sculptor, with whom he was on terms of close intimacy, Mr. Robinson always expresses the utmost esteem and regard, as "one of the salt of the earth," and "a great and good man." On March 10th, 1821, he thus writes of him:

"I took tea at Flaxman's, and enjoyed the two hours I stayed there very much. Of all the religious men I ever saw he is the most amiable. The utter absence of all polemical feeling, the disclaiming of all speculative opinion as an essential to salvation, the reference of faith to the affections, not the understanding, are points in which I most cordially concur with him, earnestly wishing at the same time that I was in all respects like him."

On the 9th September, in the same year, being at Glasgow, he relates the following amusing incident:

"I rose very early to see a new place (it was between six and seven); seeing a large building, I asked a man, who looked like a journey-weaver, what it was. He told me a grammar-school. 'But, sir,' he added, 'I think it would become you better on the Lord's Day morning to be reading your Bible at home, than asking about public buildings.' I very quickly answered, 'My friend, you have given me a piece of very good advice; let me give you one, and we may both profit by our meeting. Beware of spiritual pride.' The man scowled with a scotch surliness, and apparently did not take my counsel with as much good humour as I did his."

On the same day, Mr. Robinson heard Dr. Chalmers preach in the Iron Church, and he says:

"It was a splendid discourse against the Judaical observance of the Sabbath, which he termed 'an expedient for pacifying the jealousies of a God of vengeance,' reproaching the odious drudgery of such Sabbaths. He represented the whole value of Sabbath observance to lie in its being a free and willing service—a foretaste of heaven. 'If you cannot breathe in comfort here, you cannot breathe in heaven hereafter.' Many years afterwards I mentioned this to Irving, who was then the colleague of Chalmers, and already spoken of as his rival in eloquence, and he told me that the Deacons waited on the Doctor to remonstrate with him on the occasion of this sermon."

Having mentioned the name of Irving, who was denounced by his Church as heretical for holding the peccability of Christ's human nature, we may here bring together a few notices of this eccentric genius, for such he was.

"May 25th, 1823. I went to the Caledonian Chapel to hear Mr. Irving. Very mixed impressions. I do not wonder that his preaching should be thought to be acting, or at least as indicative of vanity as of devotion. I overheard some old ladies in Hatton-garden declaring that it was not pure gospel; they did not wish to hear any more, &c. The most unfavourable circumstance, as tending to confirm this suspicion, is a want of keeping in his discourse. Abrupt changes of style, as if written (and it was written) at a dozen different sittings. It is tone equally variable. No master-feeling running through the whole, like the red string through the Royal Marine ropes, to borrow an image from Goethe. Yet his sermon was very impressive. I caught myself wandering but once. It began with a very promising division of his subject. His problem to show how the spiritual man is equally opposed to the sensual, the intellectual, and the moral man; but he expatiated chiefly on the sensual character. He drew some striking pictures. He was very vehement, both in gesticulation and declamation. To me there was much novelty, perhaps because I am less familiar with Scotch than English preaching. Basil Montagu and several young barristers were there. The aisles were crowded by the profane, at least by persons drawn by curiosity. One unquestionable merit he had—he read the Scriptures most beautifully; he gave a new sense to them. Even the scotch hymns when he recited them, were rendered endurable."

"June 8th. I attended Mrs. J. Fordham to hear Mr. Irving, and was better pleased with him than before. There was an air of greater sincerity in him, and his peculiarities were less offensive. His discourse was a continuation of last week's—on the intellectual man as opposed to the spiritual man.

He showed the peculiar perils to which intellectual pursuits expose a man. The physician becomes a materialist, the lawyer an atheist, because each confines his inquiries, the one to the secondary laws of nature, the other to the outward relations and qualities of actions. The poet, on the contrary, creates gods for himself; he worships the creations of his own fancy. Irving abused in a common-place way the sensual poets, and made insinuations against the more intellectual, which might be applied to Wordsworth and Coleridge. He observed on the greater danger arising to intellectual persons from their being less exposed to adversity; their enjoyments of intellect being more independent of fortune. The best part of his discourse was a discrimination between the three fatal errors of—first, conceiving that our actions are bound by the laws of necessity; second, that we can reform when we please; and third, that circumstances determine our conduct."

"June 29th. Again to hear Mr. Irving. A crowd. A rush into the meeting. I was obliged to stand all the sermon. A very striking discourse; an exposition of the superiority of Christianity over Paganism. It was well done. His picture of Stoicism was admirably conceived. He represented it at the best as but the manhood, not the womanhood, of virtue. The Stoic armed himself against the evils of life. His system, after all, was but refined selfishness, and, while he protected himself, he did not devote himself to others; no kindness, no self-offering, &c. Speaking of the common practice of infidels to hold up Socrates and Plato as specimens of Pagan virtue, he remarked that this was as uncandid as it would be to represent the Royalists of the seventeenth century by Lord Falkland, or the Republicans by Milton, or the courtiers of Louis XIV. by Fénelon, the French philosophers before the Revolution by D'Alembert, or the French Republicans after by Carnot! But neither in this nor in any other of his sermons did he manifest great powers of thought."

"November 20th, 1825. Went to Irving's church. He kept us nearly three hours. But after a very dull exposition of a very obscure chapter in Hebrews, we had a very powerful discourse—the commencement of a series—on Justification by Faith. That which he calls religion and the gospel is a something I have a repugnance to. I must, indeed, be new born before I can accept it. But his eloquence is captivating. He speaks like a man profoundly convinced of the truth of what he teaches. He has no cant, hypocrisy, or illiberality. His manner is improved. He is less theatrical than he was a year ago."

"March 1st, 1829. Heard Irving preach a furious sermon against Catholic Emancipation. He kept me attentive for an hour and a half. He was very eloquent, and there was enough of argument and plan in his discourse to render it attractive to a thinking man. At the same time, the extravagant absurdities he uttered were palpable. His argument was, in short, this:—Christ ordained that the civil and ecclesiastical government should be in different hands; the King is his vicegerent in all temporal concerns, and we owe him implicit and absolute obedience; the Church is equally sovereign in all spiritual matters. The Devil raised up the Papacy, which, grasping both powers, possesses neither; for, whenever power is given to a Churchman, whenever he is raised to a magistracy, there the mystery of iniquity is made manifest; hence the diabolical character of the Papal power. In order to show that this doctrine is that of the Church of England, Irving referred to a clause in the 37th Article; but that Article merely refuses to the King the power of preaching, and of administering the Sacraments; it gives him Ecclesiastical authority in express terms; and what has Irving to say of the bench of bishops? Irving prayed against the passing of the threatened bill, but exhorted the people to submit to the Government. If persecution should follow (as is probable), they are to submit to martyrdom. In the midst of a furious tirade, a voice cried from the door, 'That is not true!' He finished his period, and then exclaimed, after a pause, 'It is well when the Devil speaks from the mouth of one possessed. It shows that the truth works.' When I heard Irving, I thought of the fanatics of Scotland in the 17th century. His powerful voice, equally musical and tender; his admirable enunciation and glorious figure, are enough to excite his audience to rebellion, if his doctrine had permitted acts of violence."

LONDON: CLERKENWELL.—On Tuesday, July 20th, about 100 of the children went to Queen Elizabeth's Lodge, Chingford. On arriving at Epping Forest, they began their gambols. At four o'clock all assembled for tea. If the few generous friends who subscribed towards the expenses could have witnessed the animating scene, they would have felt themselves amply repaid. Our correspondent writes, there is still a considerable deficiency, which if not otherwise made up, will have to be defrayed by the teachers.

LONGTON.—On the 15th ult. the Rev. N. Green conducted the first of a series of religious services in the open air in this town. The attendance was good, and the audience listened with great attention. At the conclusion of the meeting tracts were given away, "What do Unitarian Christians believe?"

FIRESIDE READINGS.

THE ANGEL SONG.

"MORTAL! hear those heavenly voices;
Hark! the spirit-world rejoices,
Singing, all those angels bright
In the land of pure delight,
Come away!

"Come! thou faint and weary-hearted,
Where true friends no more are parted;
Upward soar to heaven above;
To the paradise of love
Come away!"

"Gladly leaving all I prize,
Swiftly upward would I rise,
But that earth my limbs enchains,
And my longing soul restrains
From its flight."

"Mortal, strive a little longer,
Till thy spirit's wings are stronger,
Then 'twill break each earthly tie
And joyful take its place on high
For evermore!"

"I have striven, and am fainting,
On the dreary mountain panting;
Who my faltering steps shall lead,
And in verdant pastures feed
My trembling frame?"

"O lift thy tired eyes on high,
Look upon yon glorious sky,
One more effort only make,
Every earthly bond shall break,
And thou be free!"

When the angel's song was ended,
She with snowy wings descended,
And the weary longing one
To her bright celestial home
Bore away.

RUTH FLOWER.

A USEFUL HINT.

A TRANSCENDENTAL preacher took for his text: "Feed my lambs." A plain farmer very quaintly remarked to him on coming out of church, "A very good text, sir; but you should take care not to put the hay so high in the rack that the lambs can't reach it!"

SEA-SIDE VISITORS.

THE good people of Stornoway have been receiving visitors on a very large scale indeed. Let not the lodging house keepers of Brighton and Margate fear, however, that a rival sea-side resort has been opened, and that it is their own natural prey, the August shoal of migratory Londoners, which has escaped them and taken refuge in the Hebrides. The arrivals in the Isle of Lewis had, indeed, some of the qualities most acceptable to those vendors of watering-place hospitality. They were extremely soft, and susceptible of being squeezed to an immense amount. They formed, in short, a sort of marine Cook's Excursion party, and consisted of about two hundred bottle-nosed whales.

A few months ago the English public was roused to a brief but ardent interest in these monsters owing to Mr. Bright's peremptory refusal to go out and make war against them. Complaint had been duly lodged at the Board of Trade, setting forth that bottle-nosed whales were nothing better than Vikings, sea robbers with the advantage of needing no ships for their piratical voyages, and deserving of being hanged at the yard-arm, or boiled down into oil, as the case may be, for their treasonable practices against the Queen, her crown, and dignity, and particularly her fisheries. The sanguine complainant evidently hoped that, like another Peter the Hermit, he might successfully preach a crusade against the miscreant bottle-noses; and that the President of the Board of Trade, like another Cœur-de-lion, would rush with all his clerks to defy and harpoon the foe. Mr. Bright, however, very properly declared, in effect if not in words, that the State was not prepared to do battle with the bottle-nosed whales, and determined to leave bottle-noses and mackerel—the consumers and things consumed—without any attempt on his part to disturb the natural balance of the Atlantic market.

And now we read that a large body of these very enemies have come and surrendered themselves freely to our, not very tender mercies! Must not Mr. Bright triumph in his 'masterly inaction' of the spring? The whales have actually fulfilled for the fishermen pretty nearly the prayer of Mrs. Bond of Nursery celebrity, and "have come to be killed" at Stornoway after the manner of that millennial era, —when omelettes grow on trees,

And little pigs come crying out,
"O! eat me, if you please!"

The poor stupid creatures—it is strange how we always talk of sea-animals as if they were wholly beyond the reach of pity—got into the harbour of the wild Isle of Lewis, where they were soon surrounded by boats, and terrified by shouting fishermen till they were driven into shallow water. Here, blinded by the commotion raised by their own helpless struggles, and unable to swim, the huge shoal was gradually separated and destroyed. When the news was despatched, 175 were already dead on the shore, and the Miriams of Stornoway were sounding the loud timbrel over an infinite quantity of blubber, worth, at a moderate calculation, £700.

The Echo.

RUSSIAN PROVERBS.

A CORRESPONDENT of the Athenæum quotes a number of proverbs in use among the Russians. "Trust in God, but do not stumble yourself," admirably exemplifies that extraordinary mixture of simple piety and hard-headed shrewdness which forms the basis of the Muscovite character. A more unmixt devotion is expressed by another proverb very popular amongst the peasantry, "With God, even across the sea; without Him, not even to the threshold." These are noteworthy: "An honest man is worth more than a stone wall." "All things pass, but truth remains." "Him who lives by guile will God slay." "Never take the crooked path while you can see a straight one." "Dig not a pit for others, lest thou fall therein thyself." The proverb attributed to the monk Sylvester, "Fear not the threats of the great, but rather the tears of the poor," is a very noble one, and would furnish no bad text for a sermon. There is not a little sly humour in "A good name lies in the meadow, but a bad name runs along the road." "Measure seven times and cut once" might almost have been suggested by the Irish pedlar, famous for giving short measure, who, when asked the price of a yard of ribbon, replied, "Well, your honour, that depends very much upon the length of the yard." The rhyming saying, "Truth is severe, but to God 'tis dear," is said to be more quoted than followed. "They who wear wide sleeves, in their heart are thieves," is a bitter and not wholly unmerited hit at the provincial clergy. We may likewise give—"When life is not bright, death does not fright;" "A tongue that is pert is its own sure hurt;" "Speak out with might when your cause is right;" and, quaintest of all, "If God don't forsake us the pigs will not take us." The following satirical ones, levelled at scandal-mongers, are not bad:—"The tongue reaches as far as Kiev;" "I'll a thing to a hen (a woman), and the whole street will know it;" "A hrough heedless words the head falls off;" "Public rumour is like a wave of the sea;" "A word is not a sparrow, for when it once flies away you can never catch it again." The same bitter flavour is perceptible in "Bad words come from bad birds;" "Ask a pig to dinner, and he will put his feet on the table;" "Disease comes in by hundredweights, and goes out by ounces;" "Every little frog is great in his own bog;" "An old friend is worth two new ones," &c. "Water runs not beneath a resting stone" is the exact converse of our "A rolling stone gathers no moss," and equally appropriate to the nation which produced it. "Be praised not for your ancestors, but for your virtues" sounds like an echo of the surly independence expressed in the motto formerly assumed by a self-made millionaire—"Lords are proud of their descent; I am proud of my ascent." But more quaintly humorous, as well as more thoroughly national than all, is a saying popular among the peasantry, which shows that they are not wholly ignorant of their own strength:—"When fish are rare, even a crab is a fish; and when men are scarce, even Thomas (i.e., the peasant) is a gentleman."

ST. PATRICK'S STONE.

THE Secretary of the Baptist Irish Mission thus describes a visit to this famous stone:—"At one end of Lough Beg, or the little lake—so called to distinguish it from its big neighbour Lough Neagh—there is an islet called Church Island. Having heard much of the superstitions which belong to sacred places, I crossed the lake in a small boat, for the purpose of seeing the famous granite block known as 'St. Patrick's Stone.' The Church is a fine ivy-clad ruin, of unknown antiquity; and at a short distance from the tower, under the shade of a magnificent Irish thorn, is the famous stone where the saint is said to have performed his devotions. On the top is a hole representing the print of his knee; and in another large stone, close by, there is a groove just large and long enough to receive a man's finger, and where the finger of Patrick rested when he was in prayer. From the branches that overhang the stone, hundreds of rags, consisting of shreds of garments, kerchiefs, &c., were suspended. Pilgrims—including, of course, the diseased, halt, lame, and blind—go to pray at this holy spot, and to wash their sores in the water that is poured into the famous knee-hole; and they leave these rags as mementos of their visit, and expressions of their belief in the benefit which they expected to reap from it. There is a closer alliance between Popery and Paganism than is generally suspected. Restore the old heathen names to the places, persons, and rites of the Romish Church, and you have a restoration of Paganism almost pure and simple."

SOIREE AND PRESENTATIONS TO THE REV. H. W. CROSSKEY, GLASGOW.

A SOIREE was held in the Merchants' Hall, last Monday evening, in honour of the Rev. H. W. Crosskey, who is about to leave Glasgow for Birmingham, after a connection of 17 years with St. Vincent-street Unitarian Church. The hall was completely filled. Mr. Alexander White-law occupied the chair; and amongst those by whom he was supported on the platform were the Rev. J. F. Smith (Edinburgh), the Rev. T. W. Scott (Lochmaben), Messrs. Callander (Paisley), W. Rankin, Glassford, Seligman, Woolheim, M'Ilwraith, Knox, &c. Upon the platform also a number of ladies were accommodated.

After tea, the CHAIRMAN addressed the company. The occasion of their meeting, he said, to say farewell and God-speed to their esteemed friend and minister, Mr. Crosskey, was one that excited feelings of mingled regret and satisfaction—regret that a valued friend was about to leave them, whose cultured mind made intercourse with him a high privilege, and who was eminently qualified for the position he had long filled; satisfaction that he would return to his native country, having achieved some part of his youthful aspirations. He had gradually raised their church from a struggling position to a state of prosperity, and he now left it a comparatively young man, having done good work in the cause which he came to advocate. It required a man of no ordinary ability and attainments to fill the position both inside and outside the church which Mr. Crosskey had occupied. During so lengthened a ministry, with so little assistance, in the face of many difficulties, among a people naturally reserved and chary of their sympathy, it required special qualities to sustain him. His cheerful temper, joined to a cultivated mind, a good heart, and an enthusiasm for his avocation, gave him the key, as they would give every man the key, to the goodwill of his fellow-men. The appreciation in which he was held by the Glasgow congregation had been endorsed by a large and influential congregation in Birmingham; and Mr. Crosskey would now go to fill the pulpit of Priestley, to whom he was a worthy successor, and with whom he would have been a congenial spirit.

Mr. WILLIAM RANKIN then addressed the meeting. In the course of his remarks he said—it is now about 17 years since Mr. Crosskey came amongst us, a young man, with a good education, an ardent disposition, and a love for his high and holy vocation. During these years he has laboured faithfully, zealously, and ably, for civil and religious liberty. In the pulpit, on the platform, and with his pen he has proven himself a worthy disciple of Newman, Taylor, and Martineau, and an efficient fellow-worker with the host of able and earnest men belonging to our denomination. He came here a heretic—a dangerous man; he leaves with the character of honest integrity, of being able to give a reason for the faith which he holds; a man of whom even the most delicate Christian need not be afraid. He came to a Church largely composed of men in whom the religio-politico idea was the bond of association; he leaves a Church bound together for the worship and service of God in all the relations of life. The Lord has blessed Mr. Crosskey in his family. He has blessed him in the peace and prosperity of the congregation. He has blessed him with numerous and sincere friends. He has blessed him in breaking the chains of the slave, and in emancipating our own workmen. Having paid a warm tribute to Mrs. Crosskey, and referring especially to her active connection with the Ladies' Benevolent Society of the church, Mr. Rankin then, in the name of the congregation, presented Mr. Crosskey with a beautiful silver ewergne, bearing the following inscription: "Presented to the Rev. Henry W. Crosskey on the occasion of his removal to Birmingham, by the members and friends of the St. Vincent-street Unitarian Church, Glasgow, in recognition of seventeen years zealous and faithful service to the church and the cause of free religion in Scotland, and as a memento of the cordial and friendly feelings they entertain towards him. 2nd August, 1869." He also handed to the reverend gentleman a handsome suite of jewellery for his good lady.

Mr. CALLENDER, in the name of the Paisley Unitarian Church—a little church, he said, in which their friend had always taken a warm interest—afterwards tendered to the guest of the evening an elegant plaid and brooch for his wife.

Mr. CROSSKEY sincerely thanked his friends for their kind gifts, and for the thoughtfulness and consideration he had always experienced at their hands. It was quite possible, he remarked, for a congregation to torment a minister in strange and wayward ways. It was possible for a man to have better aims than he had had, to work with better result, and to live with higher faithfulness, and yet at the same time, to find his path a thorny and a desolate one. But he had to thank the St. Vincent-street congregation for a kindness which had never failed, and for a confidence which never made him fear to speak an honest thought. He could not but feel that he owed more to the congregation than its members owed to him.

The Rev. J. F. SMITH (Edinburgh), in response to an invitation from the chair, expressed his sympathy with the congregation in the loss they would sus-tain by the removal of Mr. Crosskey from their midst. He gave an eloquent description of the relationship which that grave organisation, the Roman Catholic Church, held to each of its members in every stage of their lives; how to them the church and the priest were everything, they nothing; so that the very existence of the faith which the church ought to be the means of developing depended upon its church and its priesthood. In Protestantism, and all religions where supernaturalism held sway, the same conditions were present, though perhaps in a less marked degree. He then referred to the simple nature of the religious principles of the Unitarian Church, principles which all creeds and ages had recognised and acknowledged, however much they may have been surrounded or covered over by the additions of priestly tradition. A congregation whose bond of union was the nurture and development of these principles, conscious of their inherent vitality, could with confidence and without fear meet changes greater by far than that which had thus brought his hearers together.

The Rev. THOMAS W. SCOTT next addressed the company. Scotland, he said, has always been, in matters of faith, one of the most conservative countries in Europe. It seemed to have been universally agreed that theology was a completed science, and Scotchmen seemed unable to cultivate in religion that spirit of independence which is their national boast. Poetry and philosophy had alike bowed to the supremacy of the national creed. Burns, it was true, had satirised the narrower preachers of his day—a sin which their successors could neither forgive nor forget. Philosophy had had no influence on religious inquiry in Scotland similar to what it had exercised in Germany. Even Hamilton had preferred to cut away the foundations of philosophy rather than call in question the national assumption that faith is above reason, and revelation a sacred territory into which reason has no means of ingress. The religious conservatism he ascribed to the power of the clergy, and to the persecutions which had been endured for the national creed, enthusiasm and suffering alike consecrating it in the affections of the people. He referred, as hopeful signs of progress, to the liberal party growing up in the Scotch establishment, and to the liberal views of much of the literature of the present day, which was preparing the country for the reception of a simpler faith. From these facts, and others, the Unitarians of Scotland might hopefully believe that there was a spirit of inquiry awakening, from which they might hope for the further spread of the great principles of free inquiry, which it was the mission of Unitarianism to maintain and extend.

Mr. WILLIAM M'ILWRAITH also briefly addressed the meeting.

At intervals the proceedings were enlivened by the efforts of the Glasgow Solo and Glee Union.

INTELLIGENCE.

MINISTERIAL APPOINTMENT.—The Rev. George Wooler, of Thorne, near Doncaster, has received and accepted a unanimous invitation to become the pastor of the Unitarian congregation in Newark, and will enter upon his labours there the first Sunday in October.

CHOWBENT.—The annual school sermons were preached on Sunday morning and afternoon by the Rev. M. C. Frankland. The congregations were large, and the collections upwards of £41.

EDINBURGH.—The Sunday-school children and teachers had their first excursion on Saturday, 31st ultimo. An omnibus conveyed them to Loganlee, in the Pentland Hills, where, after a substantial dinner, they had a pleasant afternoon's amusement.

LIVERPOOL.—On Thursday, July 22nd, the Roscommon-street Sunday-school teachers and scholars, 120 in number, were generously entertained by Mrs. Rathbone in a field adjoining her residence at Greenbank. Before returning home in the evening, the scholars stood upon the lawn in front of the house to sing their school hymns, after which each was presented with a bouquet and a book, by Mrs. Rathbone.—On Wednesday, the 28th ult., the Bond-street Ragged Schools, numbering upwards of 250 teachers and children, had a similar trip to the residence of C. P. Melly, Esq., Riversley.

LONDON: CARTER LANE MISSION.—The outdoor summer festivities at this place have just been brought to a close, and after the treat to the infants on Friday next, they will all be over. On Sunday, the 25th ult., the half-yearly distribution of prizes took place, when an appropriate address was given by the Rev. J. Taylor. The room was adorned with a large supply of flowers, furnished by several friends, and at the close of the service each scholar who had just failed of gaining the extra prize was presented with one of the baskets of flowers which hung round the room, while the others received a small bouquet, and many were the expressions of pleasure and gratitude which were evoked by the small presents. About 170 persons were present, and upwards of 30 prizes were distributed. One girl received a dress, and one boy a writing desk for having attended a whole year without losing a mark. On Monday last the general excursion of the scholars took place—380 scholars, teachers, and members of the congregation going by steamer—to Peter-sham, where a pleasant day was spent in the park.

MILES PLATING.—On Sunday, sermons were preached—one in the afternoon by the Rev. A. Rushton, and that in the evening by the Rev. Wm. Gaskell, M.A.—to defray the expenses of beautifying the chapel. The congregations were very good, and collections amounted to £11. 17s. 1d.

PRESTON.—The annual field-day of the Sunday-school took place last Saturday. A large number of friends attended, who participated with the teachers in adding to the children's amusement.

SHEFFIELD: UPPER CHAPEL.—The annual meeting of the members of the Fellowship Fund was held at Froggatt Edge, on Monday, July 26th, where the members to the number of about 60 assembled, and, after enjoying a pleasant afternoon amid the beautiful scenery, transacted the usual annual business of the fund. The report of the committee having been read, and the accounts passed, the meeting was addressed by the Rev. J. L. Short, Mr. J. Hobson, &c.

STANNINGTON.—On Wednesday, the 28th of July, the scholars, teachers, and congregation connected with the Underbank Chapel, Stannington, had their annual trip to Castleton, in four omnibuses from Sheffield and seven or eight private conveyances from the neighbourhood. Save a slight accident to one of the buses during the return journey, which was the cause of delay, the day was in every respect all that could be desired. A small instrumental band from the village accompanied the party.

THE KENT GENERAL BAPTIST ASSOCIATION.—On Tuesday week the anniversary meeting of the above Association was held at Rolvenden, when there were present friends from London, Dover, Northiam, Tenterden, &c. The sermon, on faith in the Lord Jesus Christ, was preached by the Rev. J. F. Kennard, of Billingshurst. The devotional part of the service was led by the Rev. John Martin, of Peckham, and the Rev. Thomas Briggs, of Dover. After the service the business meetings were held, and then an open conference on further missionary effort, at which the Mayor of Tenterden (Mr. J. Munn) presided. A resolution was agreed to that a second missionary be engaged for churches in this district to aid the missionary at present labouring in Kent, who is under the auspices of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and whose services are gathering large numbers of people together at some of the chapels. The tea-meeting was held in a large tent, kindly lent by Albert Winsor, Esq.; upwards of 100 took tea. Mr. H. P. Buckler presided, and the meeting was addressed by the Revs. J. F. Kennard, T. Briggs, T. Rix, R. Spears, J. Briggs, J. Martin, and Mr. W. Thomson. The speakers were all hopeful that with another missionary in this district our churches may be greatly revived and the cause of Liberal Christianity prosper.

IN REFERENCE

TO WINE it is a fact that many persons are pleased if they can say "We import our own." They have an impression that by so doing they not only get it cheaper but purer; and, besides, there is the honour of importing. They overlook altogether that those Foreign Dealers who seek them out are quite aware of this amiable weakness, and do not fail to take advantage of it to add some shillings to the price. To assist the impression they judiciously insinuate that their article is purer than what usually comes to England, and thus they lull that desire for comparison which would soon dispel the delusion.

These remarks apply specially to GERMAN WINES.

And, in proof of them, we would ask those Gentlemen who buy such Wines to compare our

Even supposing the value to be equal there is this advantage in buying here, that any quantity can be got when wanted: whereas, in importing, a quantity of money is locked up, probably for years, in an article not of every day consumption.

WHAT THE CHURCHES ARE DOING.

The Cathedral of Cologne is rapidly progressing. The northern tower now equals in height the southern one, and the chapter-house and sacristy are completed with the exception of the iron roofing. 385,617 thalers were spent on the building last year.

The Roman Catholic Bishops of the Sandwich Islands and the Marquesas have arrived in Paris, on their way to attend the Council at Rome.

The North German Correspondent publishes a considerable portion of the address of the Catholic laity of the diocese of Treves to their bishop. An organ of the Church, the Civiltà Cattolica, in Rome, lately produced a communication from a French correspondent, in which it was asserted that while the Liberal Catholics were apprehensive the approaching council would proclaim the doctrines of the Syllabus and the infallibility of the Pope, and hoped it would at least consent to modify or explain away to some extent certain of the propositions which the Syllabus contained, the true Catholics, on the other hand, were ready to accept these dogmas with acclamation. Under these circumstances the memorialists, who affirm themselves faithful and attached children of the Church, can no longer remain silent. After this explanatory preamble, to which is added a hope that the number of tenets separating the Catholics from their fellow-Christians is not about to be increased, the address goes on to express a strong hope that "the approaching Council will decide on a universal re-introduction of National, Provincial, and Diocesan Synods, which formerly stood the test of centuries." The other prominent point of their address is an elaborate pronouncement that the Council "should leave no doubt that it has definitely renounced every wish to revive the theocratic governmental forms of the middle ages."

A fearful catastrophe, not unlike that which occurred at Santiago in the year 1864, though, happily, less disastrous, has taken place in the Cathedral of Trani, near Naples. Some drapery, which had been erected for purposes of ornament took fire during a religious festival, and in the rush out of the building which ensued sixteen persons were trampled to death.

Two Frenchmen abjured Romanism at the French Protestant church, St. Martin's-le-Grand, last Sunday; M. Brun, printer, of London; and M. Blanc, formerly, for many years, precentor in the Roman Catholic church.

The Cistercian monastery of St. Bernard's Abbey, Leicestershire, is in difficulties, and it is absolutely necessary to raise £500 within three months in order to prevent a sale.

In the House of Commons, on Tuesday (August 3rd), Mr. Fawcett moved, "That in the opinion of this House, those who are not members of the Established Church cannot be placed in a position of equality with regard to University education in Ireland until all the Fellowships and Scholarships of Trinity College, Dublin, are freed from all religious disabilities;" and Dr. Ball, the member for the Dublin University, announced that the Board of Trinity College would not oppose the motion. But the Government insisted on the question being postponed because they intended to deal with the whole subject of collegiate education in Ireland, and the opening of Trinity College to all denominations would not meet the case of the Catholics, who complained that they "could not obtain a University degree except by passing through colleges constructed on a system not acceptable to the majority of the population." Mr. Fawcett very naturally interpreted this to mean that the Government favoured the erection of denominational colleges, and meditated some such desertion of the cause of mixed education, as Mr. Chichester Fortescue was once before mischievously mixed up with. Mr. Fawcett roundly took the Government to task, and drew a disclaimer from Mr. Bruce, which, however, says the English Independent, "fails to convince us that the Government do not mean to renew the 'supplemental charter' scheme, and to succumb to the Roman Catholics in the matter of University education. There will be a great fight on this matter next Session."

The Star gives the following account of the income of Trinity College, Dublin:

"So long ago as 1851 the gross income of Trinity College, Dublin, amounted to £90,000 per annum.

Its estates extend over 17 counties, and comprise 200,000 acres of land. And it has, besides, the advowsons of rich livings scattered over the country, the commutation for which will now come up to a very handsome figure. The government of this wealthy corporation is vested in a provost and seven senior fellows. Twenty-eight junior fellows form the teaching body, and 70 scholars on the foundation share in the emoluments, and participate in the election of members of Parliament for the University. All these fortunate individuals must be Protestant Episcopalians; that is to say, must belong to a sect numbering about one-eighth of the population of the country, as we all now know so well. For the other seven-eighths, the Catholics and Dissenters, there have, it is true, been lately provided 14 non-foundation scholarships, for which, if they are content with its mere money value, and do not mind the insult of being excluded from all the other privileges of a scholarship, they are admitted to compete. There are, it is true, also two or three modern professorships which are open to all the world. But above these the aspirations of Catholics and Dissenters must not rise."

It is curious to peruse some of the suggestions in the Irish Conservative and Church organs. One is that they should neither pray for Queen nor Parliament, and that supplications of this kind should be struck out of the Liturgy; and a clergyman writes to say that his congregation have threatened to leave the church if he uses them in future. The first meeting of the Commissioners under the new Act is to be held on the 14th inst.

The South London Press says that at Lambeth parish church, on Sunday morning last, the publication of the banns of marriage occupied a longer time than the reading of the sermon.

Mr. Hadfield's notice of motion, "That, in the opinion of this House, it is expedient to relieve Bishops of the Church of England from attendance in Parliament," is amongst the dropped notices.

The John Bull believes that there is not any intention on the part of the Bishop of Exeter to resign, should the Bishops' Resignation Bill become law.

The Oxford Delegates have resolved to bring out a third volume of the miscellaneous English works of Wyclif. It will be edited by Mr. Thomas Arnold.

Mr. Gladstone has given the Deanery of Durham to the Rev. W. C. Lake, a scholarly and able man, distinguished as an educational Reformer, having been a member of the Duke of Newcastle's commission in 1858. But he was a pupil of Arnold, and having imbibed Arnold's ideas, he is condemned by the Evangelical papers as only a shade "less objectionable than Dr. Temple!"

Dr. Hamilton, Bishop of Salisbury, died on Sunday, August 1, at the Episcopal palace, in the 61st year of his age. He was a member of a family which has had a representative among the dignitaries of the Church for nearly, if not quite a century. He was educated at Eton, where he had among his schoolfellows and contemporaries the present Prime Minister, Mr. Gladstone. On the death of Dr. Denison, he was nominated (1854), on the recommendation of the then Premier, Lord Aberdeen, his successor in the See of Salisbury. His lordship was the 91st incumbent of the See of Salisbury; as Bishop he enjoyed the patronage of between 50 and 60 livings, and his diocese included the greater part of the counties of Wilts and Dorset. Personally he was a man of very high character, and was a model of devotion to his Episcopal work. The Bishopric is worth £5,000 a year. Through Dr. Hamilton's death, Dr. Wordsworth, Bishop of Lincoln, becomes entitled to a seat in the House of Lords. Dr. Moberly, the new Bishop of Salisbury will not sit in the House of Lords until a vacancy arises in a diocese other than those of Canterbury, York, London, Durham, and Winchester.

Extraordinary scenes in a graveyard are reported from Belfast. The Privy Council had ordered the closing of the Shankhill burying-ground, except where there could be seven feet of earth left above each coffin, whereupon a number of owners of the graves, to evade this order, began to disinter the remains from the overcrowded graves, and to sink the graves so deep as to enable them to re-inter the coffins, and make the place available, under the terms named, for future interments. The scene is described as of the most dreadful character, coffins in all stages of decomposition lying about, and even undecayed shrouds. Ultimately the Mayor, with a police force, appeared, and having convinced the people that they were acting illegally, the graves were covered up again.

On July 31st, Mr. Josiah Mason, of Birmingham, transferred to trustees a set of almshouses for 26 women and an orphanage for 300 children, erected by him at Erdington, near that town, at a cost of £60,000, together with an endowment of £200,000! This noble charity has been thoroughly completed by the founder. Our contemporary the Inquirer gives some further particulars:

"Mr. Mason is a Wesleyan in his religious sentiments, but with a spirit of large charity which has been a marked characteristic of many of the leading members of that denomination, from the days of John Wesley downwards, he has so arranged his trust that no sectarian narrowness can now or in future years pervert or limit his generous purposes. It is a melancholy indication of the bitterness and the perversity of the sectarian spirit, that at the very outset Mr. Mason's noble charity has been met by a manifestation of the sectarian spirit. It was originally proposed to vest the management in 24 gentlemen—half Episcopalians, the other half Non-conformists; but as two or three insisted upon certain catechisms being used in the religious training of the orphans, the proposition was withdrawn by Mr. Mason."

He has accordingly vested the property after his death in the town council.

A gentleman who attended divine service at the Foundling Chapel on Sunday mentions the following fact:—He saw a respectfully dressed man enter and put a penny upon the plate as his contribution, when it was immediately returned to him with the remark that "No coppers were taken."

The Bristol Times states that the Bishop of Brechin is about to resign his see.

There is already promise of considerable activity on religious and church subjects in Parliament during next Session. Mr. Newdegate will ask for a select committee on the Roman Catholic Charities and Registration of Burials Acts; also for a select committee to inquire into the existence, character, and increase of conventual and monastic establishments. Sir R. Anstruther will propose that conventual and monastic institutions be placed under Government inspection. Mr. J. Lewis will bring in a bill to remove such disabilities as affect the clergy of any existing established church or religious denomination in the United Kingdom. Lord Sandon will ask leave to bring in a measure to prevent the introduction of changes in the accustomed mode of conducting divine worship in parish churches without the assent of the parishioners and of the bishop of the diocese, or the archbishop of the province. Mr. Cross promises a bill upon church patronage, which is also to secure the removal of certain disabilities of patrons, incumbents, and parishioners. There is likewise Mr. Somerset Beaumont's bill for "relieving bishops who shall hereafter be consecrated of their legislative and judicial duties in the House of Peers." Mr. Hadfield has given notice of another bill with the same object. Mr. Watkin Williams will propose the disestablishment of the Church in Wales. Mr. T. Chambers will call attention "to the present unsatisfactory position of the Established Church in relation to the great body of the people, and the frequent absence of that friendly co-operation between its clergy and their congregations, so essential to efficient ministrations; and to invite the House to a consideration of such changes (thoroughly consistent with its doctrines and principles) as may bring it more into harmony with the opinions and feelings of the laity, and make it a more effective instrument for evangelisation and improvement of the whole community."

A "provisional programme" of the proceedings of the next Church Congress, which is to be held in Liverpool next October, has been published. Each reader of a paper will be limited to 20 minutes, each invited speaker to 15, and each voluntary speaker to 10. The programme may have a special interest for many of our readers in Lancashire and Cheshire, in view of the proposal to devote the meetings of the Provincial Assembly to some such conference on subjects touching our church life, &c. The subjects of discussion are:

- I. Improvement of the Church's Services—How to Increase the Attendance on them—Revision of the Rubrics.
- II. Phases of Unbelief, and how to meet them.
- III. Diocesan Organization.
- IV. Exploration of Sinai and Palestine.—The Eastern Churches.
- V. Clerical Education.—The Ancient Universities.
- VI. Capabilities of our Cathedrals.

- VII. Church Work among Seamen.
- VIII. The Church Work in our Large Towns.
- IX. Church Patronage and the Superannuation of the Clergy.
- X. Education (including Sunday-schools).
- XI. Weekly Offertory and Alms-giving.
- XII. Recreations of the People.

On Sunday morning the Rev. William Jackson, minister of the Free West Church, Airdrie, suddenly dropped down dead in his pulpit while preaching. Mr. Jackson was about sixty years of age.

WHAT IS SAYING ON CHURCH MATTERS.

The English Independent says:

"The death of the Bishop of Salisbury requires the Premier at once to exercise his patronage, and if the Bishops' Retirement Bill pass he will have two other vacancies to fill up on the Episcopal Bench. Rumour very confidently gives the Bishopric of Winchester to Dr. Wilberforce, whose support of the Irish Church Bill deserves this translation. With less probability rumour names Dean Stanley for the Bishopric of Oxford, and if the late Bishop of Salisbury had not named Dr. Liddon as his successor, that able High Church preacher would probably have stepped into his shoes; but the Crown does not approve of such nominations, and resents any appearance of dictation in these matters. The Evangelicals are not likely to get any additional influence by these changes, for they have no one strong enough for the place. Yet Dr. Miller ought to have a deanery at least. He is an admirable parish clergyman, and a man of very respectable abilities. He deserves to be rewarded for the courage with which he supported the Liberal cause at the late election. The Conservatives have no qualms about promoting their friends, and there is no sort of reason why a Liberal Cabinet should not regard the claims of their friends in the Church. The Rev. Philip Hains, of Rochdale, [Wigan] should not be forgotten when one of the Lord Chancellor's good livings next falls in."

Dr. George Moberly is to succeed the late Dr. Hamilton in the bishopric of Salisbury. The Pall Mall Gazette says of him:

"He was born about the year 1803, and was educated at Winchester, whence he went to Balliol College, Oxford. He took his B.A. degree there in Easter Term, 1825, obtaining First Class Honours in Literis Humanioribus. In the following year he obtained the Chancellor's prize for the English essay. During some years he was tutor as well as fellow of Balliol College, and in 1835 was appointed to the head mastership of Winchester School, from which he retired about three years ago, when the Bishop of Winchester conferred on him the rectory of Brighthelmston, in the Isle of Wight; and the Bishop of Chester gave him a canonry in his cathedral. Dr. Moberly was also on several occasions one of the select preachers at Oxford, and is the author of several works. He is understood to be a moderate High Churchman."

The Guardian approves the choice:

"It is with much pleasure we announce the nomination of Dr. Moberly to the vacant see of Salisbury. His high reputation as a scholar and a theologian has been too long slighted by previous Ministers, but the neglect of a quarter of a century is condoned by Mr. Gladstone in time to give the English Church the full benefit of ripe learning and sound theology in one who has adorned the doctrines of his Lord in many ways. Having taken forty years ago the highest honours at Oxford, and having ever since contributed his full share in training others for Church and State, whether at the University or on Wykeham's congenial foundation, it was only last year that Dr. Moberly preached his thoughtful Bampton Lectures on the position of the laity in the Church as the body of Christ. The diocese of Salisbury is to be congratulated that the excellent Bishop Hamilton is to be followed by so wise and learned a successor."

The same paper, after expressing its general approval of the Act for enabling bishops to resign, writes thus of the Bishops of Exeter and Winchester with a quiet severity which is all the more impressive as the Guardian is about the most thoughtful and sincere of the Church organs:

"Our satisfaction is, however, in some measure diminished by the statement, which has appeared in the papers, that the two Bishops whose cases seem to have been chiefly in the contemplation of the authors of the Bill do not intend to take advantage of it. To say the truth, we do not exactly see why they should. There was nothing to prevent them from resigning before; and there is nothing to induce them to do so now. If the Bishop of Exeter, or his family, have taken no note of the feeling of Churchmen for many years past, we do not see what should bring it at present within their cognisance. If the Bishop should be spared to keep his hundredth birthday, he will not be less able to discharge his diocesan duties than he is at ninety-one. Nor can the pension be of any importance to him. His stalls at Durham and Exeter bring him the full income of a bishopric; and these, it is understood, he could retain. He has never resided in the Palace; so that he would have nothing in that way to give up. The Bishop of Winchester's is a still stronger case. He has received for more than forty years an income equal to that of four ordinary bishoprics, and he has freely used his patronage, in what Mr. Dickenson appears to consider the proper way, for the benefit of his kin. It is absurd to suppose that he can have been unwilling to resign on the score of poverty. What the Bill will do for these prelates in the way of encouraging their retirement it is hard to see."

The Telegraph, referring to Sir R. Anstruther's notice of motion on the inspection of nunneries, remarks that it is impracticable unless Catholics themselves assent to it. Some people say, "We inspect lunatic asylums and factories—why not nunneries?" But a lunatic asylum is a place where people judiciously declared unfit to manage their own affairs—are confined; and inspection simply protects those who have been certified as unfit to protect themselves. Then, the inspection of our factories and workshops was enacted by law after clear proofs that there existed in these places evil habits, enforced for purposes of pecuniary profit, and clearly inconsistent with the physical health of the persons employed. If anybody can establish that the mother superiors of most, or even of some, convents compel the nuns to work so hard that their health is injured—and that they do so for some personal gain or profit likely to be a continued stimulus—then the Legislature will probably interfere. But if a number of women live in the same house, and bind themselves to chastity, labour, prayer, or seclusion by rules voluntarily adopted and enforced only through the voluntary assent of the inmates, it is impossible to distinguish such an establishment from any other where three or more old maids—sisters or cousins or friends—may occupy the same house. We all know practically what a nunnery is; but the question, when you come to pass a restrictive, indeed, almost a penal, statute is, "What is a nunnery within the meaning of the Act?" That a number of persons pray together in a single house or room, at stated times, is no definite description; the same thing is done in every house where there are family prayers. That a number of ladies living in one house are engaged in teaching children is not distinctive; a ladies' school or a ladies' college is "open to the same objection." That a number of ladies living in the same house "go about doing good," or trying to do it, is also not a sufficient ground for inspecting them periodically at the public expense. But some nuns never go out of doors. Again, "nuns have vowed virginity and seclusion;" but if we inspect the houses where the nuns live, because they are setting a bad example, are we to inspect the lodgings of all bachelors on the same plea? But, it will be said, is there no redress for outrages on poor nuns, for secret crimes? Is the majesty of the law to be defied by convent gratings? Certainly not. When we fairly suspect any thing wrong in a private house we despise the old superstition that an Englishman's house is his castle. Any Protestant who has sound reason to believe that in an English convent there is a Barbara Ubyry, or a bleeding nun, or a murdered baby, has only to state his facts to the nearest magistrate, and he will more easily obtain a thorough investigation than he would in the case of any private house. Should inquiry confirm the suspicion he will have struck a greater blow at Popery than he could by 20 years' declamation.

The Christian World says:

"The Wesleyans have done so much for the work of education, that we are sorry to see them committing themselves so decidedly to the denominational system while they oppose it in Ireland. However, they are not the only people who fail to see that the new principles of religious equality on which we are to govern Ireland will never be satisfied by the adoption of two different principles of education in the two countries. If the one is denominational, the other must be so also. The only hope for those who dread Popish influence in Ireland is to make both purely national."

The English Independent, commenting on the Cardiff case, while thinking that there was no sufficient ground for a verdict against the Rev. and Mrs. Thomas, there being no enticing or abduction in the case, condemn them very strongly:

"Yet we too are quite ready to acknowledge that a £50 fine would not be too much to inflict upon the Thomases for their behaviour in this affair. Their equivocation and the deception practised on the father deserve punishment; and placed alongside their loud professions of anxiety that the girl, whom they had taken under their protection, should become a Christian, and 'put her trust in Jesus,' it is not wonderful that they should excite disgust. Concealment was wholly unnecessary. The girl was of age to act for herself, and there was no reason at all for secreting her. Had the parties to whom she went been high-minded persons, accustomed to decide their conduct by a true standard of honour and propriety, they would at once have told Esther Lyons that, though they would give her shelter and protection—taking care that no violence was used or harm done to her—yet it was her duty to communicate directly with her father, giving him her reasons for leaving his roof, and to see him when he called. If they had done this, they would not only have escaped trouble, but have stood high in the regard of their neighbours, and have freed Esther Lyons's 'conversion' from the suspicion which now attaches to it."

Mr. Thomas's congregation, however, seem to be of a different opinion, as the deacons, 13 in number, have sent to the Daily News the following communication:

"In consequence of the verdict given by the jury in the above case on Saturday last, Mr. Thomas on Sunday evening tendered his resignation to the church, upon the ground that if any of the members concurred in the verdict, they must believe that he and Mrs. Thomas were guilty of perjury, in which case he could not feel justified in continuing to officiate as their pastor. The members—all assembled—immediately expressed in very strong terms their disapprobation of the result of the trial, and with much feeling unanimously concurred in their disbelief of the charges brought against Mr. and Mrs. Thomas, and passed a vote of confidence as to the veracity of their evidence and statements given in court. It was finally resolved and carried with great warmth, and without one dissentient voice, 'That the resignation of Mr. Thomas be not accepted, and that his valuable services to the church be retained as heretofore.'"

A correspondent addresses the following epigrammatic comfort, apropos of the Vicar of Brompton's recent defence of the Athanasian Creed:

"To the impugnors of the Athanasian Creed—

"How sad to think of hope bereft
You'll subject be to heaven's just ire,
There'll be no Irons in the fire."

AMERICAN NOTES.

A Bostonian, travelling in Italy, found in a hotel album at Pisa the following, in the handwriting of the Rev. Mr. Pierpont, the author of the beautiful hymn beginning, "O Thou to whom in ancient time:"

"Mr. John Pierpont, of Boston, and Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Whitmarsh and Mr. J. Allen Strong, of Northampton, Massachusetts, U. S. A., who were here from the 5th to the 7th of December, 1835, are unanimously of opinion that,

If you're dissatisfied with Home, 'Sweet Home,'
Or with the Apollo Belvidere at Rome,
Or gaze upon the Medicean Stone,
Or at the columns of the Parthenon,
And see no beauty and feel no repose—
Or at St. Peter's dome turn up your nose—
You're just the man to find yourself uneasy,
At the 'Hotel Dell' Usery, at Pisa."

An inventive American genius has produced an apparatus which he says is an effectual cure for snoring. He fastens upon the nose a gutta-percha tube, leading to the tympanum of the ear. Whenever the snorer snores, he himself receives the first impression, finds how disagreeable it is, particularly in church, and, of course, reforms.

Another has invented an "improved head-rest for attachment to church pews." We would suggest that in the Apostolic church a small screen was probably added to the head-rest employed in those days, so that the officiating clergymen need not be aware of somnolent tendencies on the part of their hearers.

The antagonism in the American Episcopal Church between the Ritualists and the Evangelicals has broken out in the Western States, and a breach has been made in the house of Bishops. The Right Rev. G. D. Cummins, Bishop of Kentucky, was formerly rector of the Trinity Church, Chicago, and, making a visit lately to his old parish, he preached a sermon against chasubles, and lights, and flowers, which so aggrieved Bishop Wright, of the diocese of Illinois, that he interposed his Episcopal edict, forbidding his brother again to occupy that pulpit.

Many New York churches are now closed for the summer.

The New York and Brooklyn Associations of Methodist Episcopal ministers met on Monday to discuss the question of licensing women preachers.

The doors of our oldest university, says the New York Independent, are thrown open to woman—not as yet in all departments, but in the most advanced department, covering logically all the rest. The new president of Harvard College announces “university courses of instruction” for the ensuing year to be open “to graduates, teachers, and other competent persons, men or women.” This virtually settles the question of the joint instruction of the sexes in Harvard College, and in all our colleges. The rest is merely a question of time and, to some extent, of money, as nearly all our college institutions are already straitened for means and accommodations. But the principle is settled. With the high school open to woman on the one side and the post-graduate course on the other, the few years of the undergraduate course remain but a single corner of a besieged fortress, with the assailants in full possession of the main works.

The Western women believe in aggressive reform, if we may trust a correspondent of the Detroit Tribune. Writing from Janesville, he says:

“Quite a commotion was produced here a few evenings since by the quiet visit of the Ladies’ Phalanx to the billiard saloons. As far as we can ascertain, a secret society of about 100, comprising most of the leading respectable women of the village, has been silently formed during the past spring, without the knowledge of the other sex, for the purpose of consultation, and taking such influential measures as might be deemed most proper to resist the evil influence of liquor and gambling saloons. There are ten places here where intoxicating drinks are sold, including two hotels and two drug stores. The two principal gambling saloons, located on the principal street, are furnished in the most elegant and attractive style, with ample room for idlers and loungers—a billiard room in front, and a copious bar at the side, with private card rooms in the rear. They are kept by experienced managers, and attract the married and single men and youth of the town and surrounding country.

“The temperance lectures of the ‘Buckeye Broad Axe’ have produced much excitement here, and the close of one of these lectures, on Wednesday evening at 10 o’clock, furnished the occasion for a grand dénouement. From 70 to 80 of these ladies, without the knowledge of any out of the society, left the lecture hall and silently marched to and entered one of the billiard saloons. One of the two ladies appointed to speak, quietly addressed the keeper, saying, in substance, that they had come, in behalf of themselves and other ladies, to bear their testimony against the business of the saloon, as injurious to themselves and their families, leading their husbands, fathers, and sons into idle and dissipated habits and ruin, and respectfully asking, for their sakes and the sake of society, that he desist from the business, and follow some other calling, appealing to his conscience and his goodwill to his race, asking him what would induce him to quit the business, and finally soliciting him to promise them that he would follow it no further, &c., &c.

“The Phalanx then left, and proceeded in a body to the other billiard saloon, and then to one of the hotels, uttering similar remonstrance and requests as before, and then adjourned until six o’clock p.m. on Thursday, when they formed in a body and proceeded to the other liquor-selling establishments, giving utterance therein to the same requests. The effect upon saloon and grocery men was various. The ladies exhibiting no violence, most of the keepers were gentlemanly in their answers and bearing. Some stood pale and stolid; some acknowledged their occupation shameful, and wished themselves out of it; some admitted the crime against their race, but had felt obliged to go into it to save their business, as others had done so; some promised to leave it as soon as they could, with other apologies and replies.”

EDUCATION.

THE National Education League, among other efforts, is circulating the following:

THE SOULS OF THE CHILDREN.

By Charles Mackay, Esq.

“Who bids for the little children,
Body, and soul, and brain?
Who bids for the little children—
So young and without a stain?
Will no one bid,” said England;
“For their souls so pure and white,
And apt for all good or evil
The world on their page may write?”

“We bid” said Pest and Famine,
“We bid for life and limb;
Fever, and pain, and squalor
Their bright young eyes shall dim.

When the children grow too many,
We’ll nurse them as our own,
And hide them in secret places,
Where none may hear their moan.”

“I bid,” said Beggary, howling,
“I bid for them one and all!
I’ll teach them a thousand lessons—
To lie, to skulk, to crawl!
They shall sleep in my lair, like maggots,
They shall rot in the fair sunshine;
And if they serve my purpose,
I hope they’ll answer thine.”

“And I’ll bid higher and higher,”
Said Crime with wolfish grin,
“For I love to lead the children
Through the pleasant paths of sin.
They shall swarm in the streets to pilfer,
They shall plague the broad highway,
Till they grow too old for pity,
And ripe for the law to slay.

“Prison, and hulk, and gallows,
Are many in the land,
’Twere folly not to use them,
So proudly as they stand.
Give me the little children—
I’ll take them as they’re born,
And feed their evil passions
With misery and scorn.

“Give me the little children,
Ye good, ye rich, ye wise,
And let the busy world spin round,
While ye shut your heedless eyes;
And your judges shall have work,
And your lawyers wag the tongue,
And your gaolers and policemen
Be fathers to the young.

“I and the Law, for pastime,
Shall struggle day and night:
And the Law shall gain, but I shall win,
And we’ll still renew the fight:
And ever and aye we’ll wrestle,
Till law grow sick and sad,
And kill in his desperation
Th’ incorrigibly bad.

“I, and the Law, and Justice,
Shall thwart each other still;
And hearts shall break to see it:—
And innocent blood shall spill!
So leave,—Oh, leave the children
To Ignorance and Woe,—
And I’ll come in and teach them
The way that they should go.”

“Oh, shame!” said true Religion,
“Oh, shame that this should be!
I’ll take the little children;
I’ll take them all to me;
I’ll raise them up with kindness
From the mire in which they’ve trod,
I’ll teach them words of blessing,
I’ll lead them up to God.”

“You’re not the true Religion,”
Said a sect with flashing eyes;
“Nor thou,” said another, scowling,
“Thou’rt heresy and lies.”
“You shall not have the children,”
Said a third with shout and yell;
“You’re Antichrist and bigot—
You’d train them up for hell.”

And England, sorely puzzled
To see such battle strong,
Exclaimed with voice of pity,
“Oh, friends, you do me wrong!
Oh, cease your bitter wrangling;
For, till you all agree,
I fear the little children
Will plague both you and me.”

But all refused to listen;
Quoth they, “We bide our time;”
And the bidders seized the children—
Beggary, Filth, and Crime;
And the prisons teemed with victims,
And the gallows rocked on high,
And the thick abomination
Spread reeking to the sky.

THE LATE REV. R. BROOK ASPLAND.

LETTERS have been received by the secretary of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, expressive of the sympathy of the Unitarians in Hungary and America with their brethren in England on the death of Mr. Aspland. The Consistory of Klausenburg writes:—“We have heard with deep regret of the death of the Rev. R. B. Aspland,” and they express their most sincere sorrow and sympathy “at the departure of the good man who showed us so many times true friendship, goodwill, and precious sympathy. . . . His name, earnest working, and perfect Christian character have been known to us for many years, and will always be remembered by our community.” From the United States the secretary of the American Unitarian Association writes:—“Many of us share deeply the feeling of bereavement which Mr. Aspland’s death has caused; it was through him that we first felt the sympathetic cordiality on the part of English brethren which has been the source of so much help and joy to all.”

On the death of the Rev. J. J. Tayler, the secretary writes:—“We recognise his loss hardly less than you. He was not in such personal relations with us as Mr. Aspland, but we all knew and valued those eminent qualities which made him a tower of strength for our cause, and an object of our affectionate regard.”

It is gratifying to find that the character and labours of our eminent men are so well known and highly appreciated by our co-religionists both in Europe and America.

JUSTICE TO CATHOLICS—BUT NO MORE!

THE Government is showing a tenderness in dealing with the Roman Catholics—we fear it must be called a timidity—which we do not like to see. By all means let the Catholics have fair play—absolute equality and uniformity of treatment with all other classes of British subjects, but certainly not one iota more. Yet it seems to us that there is a tendency to allow more, and we know that an impression prevails among Catholics that they are gradually becoming formidable enough to obtain whatever terms they choose for themselves.

Two suggestive instances of this timidity are just now brought prominently forward. One of these is the strong opposition offered at the close of the recent Session, on the very flimsiest and silliest ground, to a proposition, very reasonable though emanating from Mr. NEWDEGATE, that the same information should be required and published about Roman Catholic Charitable Trusts as about the charities of all other religious bodies. Now, of all the bodies in the ecclesiastical world, the one from which such publicity ought to be required is this very one in whose favour hitherto an exception has been made. Whether we consider the sources from which such charities arise, often under sacerdotal influences which the law has always regarded with just suspicion; or their administration, in large measure by priests; or their direction, almost invariably of the most purely sectarian kind, there are good grounds for requiring thorough publicity to all proceedings in connection with them. The fact appears to be that property is rapidly accumulating in the hands of Roman Catholic ecclesiastics; and in consequence of a clause in the Act of 1860, for which Lord WESTBURY is responsible, a main design in passing it was defeated, and the result is that Roman Catholics possess exemptions in regard to their charitable trusts not enjoyed by other sects. The exact nature of Mr. NEWDEGATE’S motion was, for a return that would embrace the necessary information as to the accumulation and disposal of Roman Catholic Church property in England for the last three years, such as was afforded in Ireland by the Commissioners of Bequests for the same period. The Government, however, through Mr. Bruce, objected to this, on the ground of the time and trouble that it would take, and also that it was unfair to make Roman Catholic charities the subject of special inquiry. It was fully shown by Mr. HENLEY, Mr. AYTOUN, and Mr. M’LAREN that these reasons would not hold. Returns of a far less interesting and important character, and involving quite as much trouble, are moved for almost every week, and no such objection is heard of. And if they would appear to make Roman Catholics the object of special inquiry, this only arises from the fact that heretofore they have enjoyed a special exemption. One answer is sufficient. Such returns are required from others, why should those of the Roman Catholics be omitted?

Equally significant, as showing a timid hesitation in treating with Roman Catholics like other people, was the opposition offered by Government to Mr. FAWCETT's motion for throwing open the Fellowships of Trinity College, Dublin, to Catholics and Nonconformists, the exact terms of which will be found in another column. It is impossible to help suspecting from Mr. BRUCE's reply, that Government is not yet quite clear of the mischievous scheme of two years ago, for playing into the hands of the Romish ecclesiastics, by establishing a Roman Catholic university, and so upsetting the system of general national education with which there is good reason to believe the Catholic laity are well enough satisfied. Now this will not do, and the sooner Government understands it the better. Do not let us have propositions to restore in the case of the Roman Catholic Church the very exclusiveness which we are just doing away with in the case of the Irish establishment. If there is one thing more than another in which lies the hope for the future of Ireland it is in mixed education.

The fact is that Catholicism is very difficult to deal with in statesmanship as in every other part of society's action. Catholics individually are for the most part as pleasant, as intelligent, as liberal as the members of any other religious community; but as an organisation, and in all matters affecting their ecclesiastical existence, they retreat into the stolid impenetrability of a secret society moved by the hand of an unseen priesthood. They still retain, and manifest in an increasing degree, that sense of primary allegiance to a foreign power which from the time of ELIZABETH to the end of the seventeenth century, made them the objects of dread and suspicion to the English people at large. We hoped that that feeling had passed away, and a generation ago it seemed to have done—Catholicism, as it existed in our midst, being thoroughly English, like any other branch of English religious life. But this generation has seen a great change. The policy of Rome has been to assimilate the Catholicism of England to that of the Continent. Rome is jealous of all strong national feeling and character. And she has her reward. English Catholicism has never been for three centuries past so compact and isolated an ecclesiasticism as it is to-day. But as a set-off, there is steadily rising up something of the old suspicion and dislike to it, even among those who like ourselves have fought the battle for its fair and equal position alike in England and Ireland.

GENEVESE EXCLUSIVENESS.

PASTOR FONTANES, the president of the Consistory of Havre, having been called to Switzerland in June last by family affairs, was invited by a pastor at Geneva to preach for him. It was necessary that leave should be obtained from the Consistory; and on an application being made, the Board of Pastors took the matter into consideration, and finally resolved by a majority of 15 to 12 to refuse the pulpit to M. Fontanès.

The cause of the decision was the prominent position which M. Fontanès occupies as a leader of the Liberal party in the French Church, and the heterodox character of his writings. Great stress was laid upon the following quotation from one of his works: "Revelation must lose its value as the human mind matures. Man cannot always be in bondage to these elementary books: he will gradually find the doctrine of Divine Unity independent of the Old Testament, and that of immortality independent of the New. Ignorance defied the Bible; science will unveil the idol's earthen feet." It was also believed that was the beginning of a systematic introduction of foreign heresiarchs as occasional preachers; and reference was made to a circular which had been lately issued, inviting the aid of "all Christians friendly to religious liberty" to afford "some eminent preachers an opportunity of stating their views to the many persons who, firmly attached to Christianity, desire its legitimate development and expansion by means of liberal and rational teaching."

The minority of pastors who supported M. Fontanès was, as will be seen above, a large one; larger indeed than on the similar occasion of the exclusion of M. Reville. They tendered a formal protest against the decision of the majority, asserting "that measures restricting the liberty of the pulpit can only injure the cause of the Gospel, which is that of truth. That confessions of faith, when imposed or introduced by stratagem, are contrary to the Protestant principle that every Christian should form an uncontrolled and individual belief." So many pastors and laymen expressed sympathy with M. Fontanès that he was induced to deliver an address on "Christianity and Modern Society" on Friday, 2nd July. He was warmly received by a large audience, who responded enthusiastically to his appeal to them "not to allow Geneva to become the Protestant Rome." C.

RELIGIOUS CONDITION OF SWITZERLAND.

LAUSANNE, AUGUST 7TH, 1869.

I HAVE been surprised to find that the Herald has not taken notice of the great religious movement which is now agitating Switzerland. Orthodoxy and Rationalism are in open war here. The booksellers' windows are filled with pamphlets pro and con, and pastors belonging to the same church are taking opposite sides! The Consistory of Geneva has prohibited a French pastor at Havre from officiating in their cathedral, and the Consistory of Berne has just issued an "encyclical" against Rationalism, which several pastors have refused to read! At Langenthal, in the Canton of Berne, a meeting was held on Sunday, the 25th July, when the following address was adopted:

"Considering that the essence of Protestantism consists in free examination, and full liberty of creed and of conscience, and that every man is bound to examine for himself, and not to submit to those who take upon themselves to rule the Church;

"And that no person has any authority to impose on another his individual opinion in matters of religion;

"We protest strongly and solemnly against any violence in matters of religious belief, and in particular against the pastoral letter recently issued by the synod of this canton.

"The meeting expresses also its thanks to those communes who have rejected the said letter, and it desires others to follow so good an example. It also thanks those pastors who have refused to read the letter, and who have stood boldly forward as champions of free inquiry. It also demands that the Synod shall be reformed and reconstituted on a democratical principle, the laity forming a portion, and all the members being submitted to a popular voting."

"It also insists that pastors shall not be imposed by the Synod, but shall be elected by the congregations.

"Finally, the people are invited to treat the 'pastoral' of the Bernese Synod as a bigoted manifestation of opinion of a party, with whom the people at large hold no sympathy."

In the Canton de Vaud, the use of the Apostles' Creed is a subject of controversy, and several pastors have refused to read it.

I am convinced that if some brochures, stating our opinions, were translated into French and German and circulated in Switzerland, their success would be beyond all doubt. I am constantly asked about Unitarianism, and I know that a chapel in Lausanne would be well attended. It is all very well to make efforts to convert the Hindoo, but, in my opinion, the great field for Unitarian exertion is the Continent, and in particular Switzerland, where the bread cast on the waters by Socinus, of Zurich, is being found after many days.

ROUGH NOTES OF A HOLIDAY VISIT TO SOME ENGLISH CATHEDRALS, &c.

NO. III.—CAMBRIDGE.—ST. PAUL'S CATHEDRAL; WESTMINSTER ABBEY; AND ST. GEORGE'S CHAPEL, WINDSOR.

I SPENT a little time at Cambridge, and saw what I could of its seventeen colleges and halls, and the Fitzwilliam Museum besides. They will not, on the whole, bear comparison, architecturally, with the splendid buildings of the sister University of Oxford. I except King's College Chapel, a fine specimen of the Perpendicular style (A.D. 1441), and most interesting and effective in its interior. Its designer was indeed a great master of his art, but is unknown to us even by name. The general character of the collegiate buildings here is, that they are plain and ineffective, many being built of red brick, and when of stone are in the classic style of a period when it was by no means at its best estate. The quiet, reposeful spaces and walks in the interiors, are very interesting and picturesque. It is a great charm to a book-loving man to pass under the gateways and walk through the quadrangles, which have been paced by Bacon and Milton, Barrow and Newton, George Herbert and Dryden (though it's wrong to yoke the saintly with a very unsaintly poet), and a hundred more besides of England's greatest sons. Several colleges are being repaired and extended, and the newer architecture improves greatly upon that of older date. I went down to the river, and was amply rewarded by the fine views it afforded of the different colleges on its banks. It was a lovely evening, and the declining sun threw a golden radiance over all. Very enjoyable it was to row quietly along between charming meadows on the one hand, and ancient halls of learning on the other; their garden walls covered with ivy, or overhung with the graceful pendants of the willow. Now and again the chimes of colleges and churches sounded sweetly on the calm, still air; wood-pigeons were cooing in the trees; and altogether it was a pleasant hour, the impressions of which I hope often vividly to recall. On leaving my boat I sauntered through the fine walks on the meadow side, especially the magnificent glades of Trinity. Trinity Walk is a picture that couldn't but rouse enthusiasm in any soul not dull as

"The fat weed

That rots itself in ease on Lethe wharf."

A hundred leafy giants in double row, their foliage interlacing fifty or sixty feet above one's head, and gilded here and there by the setting sun, made a vista which was simply perfect. An academic grove such as this might bring back Socrates and Plato from Elysian fields, to meditate once more on earth, and frame divine philosophies.

What a contrast is St. Paul's to the Gothic Cathedrals I had recently inspected! Some qualities it has in common with them, and these are perhaps its chief glories,—great space and admirable proportions. The dome is a grand inspiration; the nave and transepts fine and impressive; but the choir is flat and tame, and may be contrasted, but not compared, with the Gothic edifices in this respect. There are two side-chapels, which in their present dingy state are anything but ornamental. They should either be cleaned, or concealed from view without delay. Perhaps, as the Dean and Chapter have so far sacrificed the dignity of a wealthy corporation as to put up a large poor's-box, soliciting donations towards the restoration of the Cathedral, a little paint may eventually be afforded; or at least some whitewash! Nobody would apply strong terms to the reverend administrators of this great foundation. Still it is mean and contemptible to place a begging petition like this on the pillar of a grand national edifice. What must our American cousins, whom I met everywhere, think of so unworthy a proceeding? And it is the more mortifying as, in many respects, the enormous cost (£740,000) of this great church, furnishes about the only reply that a Protestant can make to a Roman Catholic who asks, naturally enough, when did Protestants build Cathedrals to compare in costliness and magnitude with those of the period prior to the Reformation? The monuments here are less objectionable than the majority of those in Westminster Abbey; but many of them would do the State more service in supplying material for the splendid new embankment on the Thames, than in disfiguring the walls of this sacred edifice. Not a few of the heroes they commemorate are small men enough, when no longer regarded in the flattering and delusive light of contemporary history. Captains of ships, and sometimes mere subalterns, who fought during the French wars; second-rate dignitaries of the Church; and legislators who could not hold a place in even the third rank of modern statesmanship, are eulogised in absurdly inflated terms, and done in marble in the oddest combinations with broadsides of grinning cannon, the walls of forts, allegorical figures of Death, Neptune, and other impossibilities. No wonder that foreigners make merry at British art, when they behold such parodies on sculpture as these enshrined in the greatest of our modern Cathedrals!

I attended evening service in WESTMINSTER ABBEY. It was flat and cold. I expected at least a musical treat in the anthem, but it was ineffective and quite devoid of interest in any respect. I afterwards wandered about for some time, and greatly admired the splendid effect of the nave. The lowest tier of arches is very elegant in its proportions; the triforium smaller than any I had so far seen; whilst the clearstory is very large and fine. The lighting is unusually good,—“religious,” but not “dim.” I looked about among the monuments here. Certainly there are a few excellent specimens of chiselled marble; but the greater part are unworthy of a place in any building, sacred or profane, while more than one or two are grotesque and even offensive. If a clear half of them were carted to waste ground where “rubbish may be deposited,” though some people might grieve, the judicious would rejoice. A lady, with an unmistakable Yankee accent, asked me which was the part of the Abbey where our kings and queens were crowned? I could not but be gratified with this manifestation of Republican interest, and willingly escorted her to a spot historically so interesting. “Poets’ Corner” was undergoing repairs, and I was thus unable to visit the burial-place of so many of the great lights of literature, and of other noble servants of the State and benefactors of humanity.

ST. GEORGE’S CHAPEL, WINDSOR, is an elegant and beautiful structure, with many interesting historical associations. At the evening service I had a seat in the choir, nearly opposite the royal box, so well represented in Frith’s picture of the Prince of Wales’s marriage. My stall was that appropriated to “the most noble and puissant Duke of Somerset”—as indicated by a brass plate conveying this information, and a number of particulars besides—one of which is that he is a member of the noble “ordre de la Jarretière.” The inscriptions on all the stalls are in French, and each is surmounted by the coat of arms and motto of the knight to whom it is allotted. The music was good; the voices decidedly better in quality than any I had heard in the cathedral; the organ very sweet and rich in tone, and played with exquisite taste and skill. The anthem was brief enough; indeed the entire service was over in five-and-thirty minutes—quite a performance—not a sentiment of common worship about it. I was a little surprised to hear a prayer that isn’t usually put up in the course of the liturgy;—“We pray for Thy especial favour, O Lord, on our gracious lady sovereign, and on all the knights of the most noble order of the garter. Amen.” But I suppose they can do as they like in the Royal Chapel of Windsor! H.R.

HENRY CRABB ROBINSON’S “DIARY.”

V.

UNDER date April 13th, 1823, Mr. Robinson describes a curious letter, written in 1757 by Thurlow to a Mr. Caldwell, who appears to have wanted his advice how to annoy the parson of his parish:

“Thurlow begins by saying: ‘I have confined myself to consider how a parson lies obnoxious to the criminal laws of the land, both ecclesiastical and secular, upon account of his character and office, omitting those instances in which all men are equally liable.’ And he terminates his review by a triumphant declaration: ‘I hope my Lord Leicester will think, even by this short sketch, that I did not talk idly to him, when I said that parsons were so hemmed in by canons and statutes that they can hardly breathe, according to law, if they are strictly watched.’ After writing of the Statutes of Uniformity, he has this passage: ‘I have known many clergymen, and those of the best character, followers of Eusebius, who have, in the face of all these laws, refused to read the Athanasian Creed. Considering the shocking absurdity of this creed, I should think it a cruel thing to punish anybody for not reading it but those who have sworn to read it, and who have great incomes for upholding that persuasion.’”

November 24th, of the same year:

“Went to the King’s Bench, where one of Carlile’s men was brought up for judgment for publishing blasphemy. A crazy Catholic, French, spoke in mitigation. ‘My lords,’ he said, ‘your lordships cannot punish this man, now that blasphemy is justified by Act of Parliament.’ This roused Lord Ellenborough: ‘That cannot be, Mr. French.’ ‘Why, my lord, the late Bill repealing the penalties on denying the Trinity justifies blasphemy!’ This was a very sore subject to Lord Ellenborough, on account of the imputed heterodoxy of the Bishop of Carlisle, his father. French could only allege that this might have misled the defendant. He was put down, after uttering many absurdities. On this the defendant said: ‘I should like to know, my lords, if I may not say Christ was not God without being punished for it?’ This brought up Best, and he said: ‘In answer to the question so indecently put, I have no hesitation in saying that, notwithstanding the Act referred to, it is a crime punishable by law to say of the Saviour of the world that he was’—and then there was a pause—‘other than he declared himself to be.’ He was about to utter an absurdity, and luckily bethought himself.”

In September, 1824, Mr. Robinson paid a visit to the monastery of La Trappe, which “did not bring him nearer to Catholicism in inclination.” His fare, and that of two other guests, for dinner, was a soupe maigre, very insipid; a dish of cabbage, boiled in what he should have thought butter, had not that been a prohibited luxury; a dish of boiled rice seasoned with a little salt, but by no means savoury; and barley or oatmeal boiled, made somewhat thick with milk—not disagreeable, considered as prison allowance. Through the windows Mr. Robinson could see the monks at their dinner at a long table, with a sort of porridge-pot before them, while the readers in the several apartments were reading to the diners. He saw the dormitories, and found that the monks slept on boards covered with a thin piece of cloth or serge. Each had his name written on his den. He says:

“My informant told me that the monks have only a very short interval between prayer and toil and sleep; and this is not called recreation lest the recluse should be led to forget that he is to have no enjoyment but what arises from the contemplation of God. If they sweat, they are not allowed to wipe the sweat from their brows; probably because they think this would be resistance to the Divine command. The monks labour very little, from pure weakness. . . . On my going away, the priest who had first spoken to me came again, and asked me my object in coming. I said: ‘A serious curiosity;’ that I wished to see their monastery; that I knew Catholics grossly misrepresented Protestantism from ignorance, and I believed Protestants misrepresented Catholicism in like manner. He took my hand at parting, and said: ‘Though you are not of our religion, we should be glad to see you again. I hope God in His grace will bring you to the true religion.’ I answered: ‘I thank you for the wish. If your religion be the true one, I wish to die a believer in it. We think differently; God will judge between us.’”

“November 4th. Walked to Newington. Mrs. Barbauld was going out, but she stayed a short time with me. The old lady is much shrunk in appearance, and is declining in strength. She is but the shade of her former self, but a venerable shade. She is 81 years of age, but she retains her cheerfulness, and seems not afraid of death. She has a serene hope and quiet faith—delightful qualities at all times, and in old age peculiarly desirable.”

To this may be added a few lines from a letter to his brother, written in 1852:

“This reminds me of my leave-taking of Mrs. Barbauld on my going to France, anno 182—, &c. She was suffering from a severe cold with a cough. ‘I hope I shall find you better on my return.’ ‘Why so?’ ‘That seems a foolish question; health is better than sickness.’ ‘Not always; I do not wish to be better. But don’t mistake me. I am not at all impatient, but quite ready.’ She was I believe a couple of years older than you are now when she died—a few weeks after my leave-taking.”

On January 24th, 1825, Mr. Robinson “breakfasted and had a pleasant morning at Mr. John Wood’s,” Chairman of the Board of Inland Revenue, of whom he says, “he is a rare example of independence and courage, not renouncing the profession of his unpopular religious opinions.” Among those present was Dr. Shepherd, of Gateacre, who related the following droll anecdote, which he had just heard from the manager of Covent-garden Theatre, and which Mr. Robinson was fond of repeating:

“We have to do, said the manager, with a strange set of people. Yesterday there was a regular quarrel between a carpenter and a scene-shifter about religion. One was a Jew, whom the other, a Christian, abused as belonging to a blood-thirsty race. ‘Why am I bloodthirsty?’ replied the Jew. ‘When my forefathers conquered Palestine they killed their enemies, the Philistines; but so do you English kill the French. We are no more bloodthirsty than you.’ ‘That is not what I hate your people for; but they killed my God, they did.’ ‘Did they? Then you may kill mine, if you can catch him.’”

During a tour in Ireland, in 1826, Mr. Robinson saw a good deal of O’Connell. Travelling with him outside a coach, he found him “a capital companion, with high animal spirits, infinite good temper, great earnestness in discussion, and replete with intelligence on all the subjects they talked upon.” He says:

“There was sufficient difference between us to produce incessant controversy, and sufficient agreement to generate kindness and respect. Perceiving, at first, that he meant to have a long talk on the stirring topics of the day, I took an early opportunity of saying, ‘In order that we should be on fair terms, as I know a good deal about you, and you know nothing about me, it is right that I should tell you that I am by education a Dissenter, that I have been brought up to think, and do think, the Roman Catholic religion the greatest enemy to civil and religious liberty, and that from a religious point of view it is the object of my abhorrence. But, at the same time, you cannot have, politically, a warmer friend. I think emancipation your right. I do not allow myself to ask whether in like circumstances you would grant us what you demand. Emancipation is your right. And were I a Roman Catholic, there is no extremity I would not risk in order to get it.’ These, as nearly as possible, were my words. On my ending, he seized me by the hand very cordially, and said, ‘I would a thousand times rather talk with one of your way of thinking than with one of my own.’ Of course, the question of the truth or falsehood of the several schemes of religion was not once adverted to, but merely the collateral questions of a historical or judicial bearing. And on all these O’Connell had an infinite advantage over me, in his much greater acquaintance with the subject. He maintained stoutly that intolerance is no essential principle of the Roman Catholic Church, but is unhappily introduced by politicians for secular interests, the priests of all religions having yielded on this point to kings and magistrates. Of this he did not convince me. He also affirmed—and this may be true—that during the reign of Queen Mary not a single Protestant was put to death in Ireland. Nor was there any reaction against the Protestants during the reign of James II.”

“ETERNAL” AND “EVERLASTING” IN SCRIPTURE.

BY THE REV. R. MEDCALF.

“WHEN the Gospel speaks of unquenchable or everlasting fire, does it not mean one which never ends?” It does not mean that in ancient books. Dr. Paige, in his excellent commentary, has given several quotations to show the use of the expression.

Strabo, . . . speaking of the Parthenon, . . . says, “In this was the inextinguishable or unquenchable lamp,” by which he simply means a lamp which was extinguished or quenched ages ago.

Plutarch calls the sacred fire of the temple unquenchable, though he says in the very next sentence it had sometimes gone out.

Josephus says the altar-fire of the Jews “continued always unquenchable,” although, at the time he wrote, altar and temple had been both destroyed.

Eusebius . . . describing the martyrdom of several Christians at Alexandria, says, “they were carried on camels through the city, and in this elevated position were scourged and finally consumed in unquenchable fire,” though it could not have burned probably more than an hour or two at most.

For a fuller account, see Paige’s Commentary, Vol. I., Mark ix.

For the Jewish use of the word “everlasting,” the best plan is to take a Concordance, and search out all the passages where the term is used in the Bible. As soon as I had done that I felt that, except when applied to the Supreme Being, the word “everlasting,” while denoting long duration, does not always or necessarily mean what we do by the phrase “never ending.” It was popularly applied to many things which we now came to an end years ago. In my MS. notes of Dr. Noyes’s exegesis, I find he makes substantially the above statement.

Yet in the gospel use of words, eternal or everlasting had not so much reference to length of time, as to the quality of joy or sorrow. The “eternal life” which comes from knowing God and Christ is not immortal existence, but spiritual life, joy, or blessedness. So we enter into eternal life now by sharing in the Gospel privileges and blessings. On the other hand, in the judgment scene recorded by Matthew, the everlasting punishment does not refer so much to its duration as to its quality and means, in popular language, spiritual misery, privation, death, the failure to gain Christian life and blessedness.

Another question often asked is: "How can all men be saved when some Pharisees committed, as Jesus says, an unpardonable sin?" My reply is, that Jesus did not teach that any one will fail at last to receive forgiveness. To show the great guilt of some, and the great difficulty they would find in being reconciled to God, he said, "Whosoever speaketh a word against the Son of Man, it shall be forgiven him; but whosoever speaketh against the Holy Ghost, it shall not be forgiven him, neither in this world, neither in the world to come." He meant exactly what we do by calling any one "incorrigible," which is never to be taken literally, as implying that he cannot possibly be corrected, but only as showing how faint hopes we have of making him better.

But to appreciate Jesus' words, we must look at other instances of the same kind of expressions among his people.

Hosea vi. : 6, "I desired mercy and not sacrifice;" this means that Jehovah desired both, but preferred mercy to sacrifice.

John vi. : 27, "Labour not for the meat which perisheth, but for that meat which endureth unto everlasting life." Jesus meant that we should labour for both, but especially for the latter.

Acts v. : 4, "Thou hast not lied unto men but unto God." He had lied unto men, also, but the apostle meant that the part of the sin which was committed against God was so much the worse that the other sank into nothingness.

The most curious illustration of this idiom is in the parable of the supper, Luke xiv. : 12-14, where Jesus says that when you give a dinner or supper party, you must ask not your friends, brethren, or kinsmen, but the poor, lame, and blind. Almost every New England family breaks the letter of that precept on Thanksgiving-day, and the rest of the Christian world break it at Christmas! But evidently the Master meant that charity to the needy is a higher virtue than simply the hospitable entertainment of friends.

Now Jesus used this very same idiom in the twelfth chapter of Matthew, and he meant that whoever blasphemes against the Holy Ghost will find it harder to obtain forgiveness than if he commits any other sin. The difficulty, however, will come, not from God's unwillingness to pardon, but from the hardened state of heart which will make such a man among the very last to repent and ask forgiveness. The Saviour, therefore, did not teach that there is an unpardonable sin, but only that there is one which is far worse than all the rest.

Hence, after all these questions, I still believe that every soul will at last turn to the Heavenly Father in humble penitence, and seek and obtain forgiveness.

The Rev. Francis Bishop, of Chesterfield.

THIS has been a year of sad losses to our church. To the names which have of late occupied our obituary column, we have now to add that of Francis Bishop—an excellent and indefatigable minister who has passed away very suddenly to the sorrow of the whole town of Chesterfield, where he had won the respect of all sects and parties.

Mr. Bishop sprang from a Dorsetshire family. He was born in 1812. He was not originally intended for the ministry, and on leaving school became assistant to a chemist at Taunton, but after some years in business the natural bias of his character led him to prepare for the pulpit. For some years he was engaged in private studies, and ultimately was for a time a student in some of the classes at University College, London. We do not know where he was first settled, but he occupied successively the pulpits at Warrington and Exeter, and from Exeter removed to Liverpool to undertake the charge of the Domestic Mission. This was the work by which he became widely known, and for which he will be longest remembered. He had a singular gift for such ministry among the poor; a heart full of kind sympathy, deep religious feeling, and great tact in dealing with the many strange characters and experiences with which his work made him acquainted. Fresh in the writer's recollection is a day years ago spent with Mr. Bishop in the midst of his ordinary work in the poor district of Liverpool where his mission was situated; a day which insensibly showed what the pastoral work of a minister might be, and left impressions never to be forgotten. Nor was it only in the courts and cellars of the Liverpool poor that Mr. Bishop's work was done. He had the faculty of interesting others in the work to which his life was given. He was known and respected as an authority on matters touching the condition of the poor by magistrates and guardians, and men of all sects and parties in Liverpool, and he won a place for town missions in the estimation of our churches which they had not held since the impression of Dr. Tuckerman's visit in 1834 had died away. He left Liverpool in 1856, but the work he did there lives yet in many a life lifted up out of the degradation of drunkenness and crime, and many a home made happy through his influence.

For the next two years he laboured in Manchester in the double capacity of Missionary Tutor at the Home Missionary Board and of minister to the poor at the Rochdale Road Domestic Mission. His work here, however, was beset by peculiar difficulties. He felt acutely the absence of interest and co-operation in his mission work on the part of the Manchester congregations, who, after inducing him to leave his work in Liverpool, seemed to think nothing more was needed; and his position at the Home Missionary Board was too undefined to enable him to do the work which he had hoped for. The consequence was that in 1858 he accepted the cordial invitation of our Chesterfield congregation to become their minister, on the secession of the Rev. A. Turner Blythe, and here he has since remained. His devotedness to his ministry here, alike in the congregation and in the schools, is too well known to need any testimony of ours. Regarded at first with considerable jealousy by the orthodox bodies of the town as he uniformly claimed his position in all public movements, as one of the Christian ministers of the place, he gradually won a very high standing among them. He was a staunch advocate of total abstinence, and an unflinching opponent of State-churchism, both in its political aspect and in its local pretensions. Some years ago he visited America, and he was the intimate and beloved friend of all both there and in England who have been best known in the movements for peace, temperance, and anti-slavery.

Some years ago he had a severe paralytic attack, which laid him aside for many months. From this he entirely recovered, but it showed a liability to such attacks which obliged him to be a little less active than he had been previously. Latterly he had been ill about one month, but on the 5th instant, the day of his death, he felt sufficiently well to drive out. Accordingly, he did so, but had not been out long ere he felt suddenly faint. He was hurried home, and had only just been carried into his house before he died, in the 57th year of his age.

He was interred on Monday last, 9th instant, in the burial ground of the Unitarian Chapel, Saltergate, Chesterfield. The members of the Mechanics' Institution, with a number of respectable tradesmen, and a number of members of the congregation walked in procession with the funeral, and the inhabitants of the neighbourhood testified their respect for the deceased by drawing their blinds, and hundreds of persons accompanied the mournful procession to the chapel. The service commenced with an appropriate hymn being sung by the choir, after which the Rev. J. L. Short read the service for the burial, and addressed the assembly. The body was afterwards removed to the graveyard, and the choir having sung a hymn it was consigned to the tomb, strewn with flowers by the school children, in the presence of a large concourse of people.

Alderman James Taylor, of Bolton.

ON Friday, August 6th, Ald. James Taylor died at his residence, 13, Chorley Old-road, Bolton, from an attack of paralysis, in the 63rd year of his age. Thus has passed away a truly practical, intelligent, and unostentatious man. His early years were spent in hard toil at the works of Messrs. Dobson and Metcalfe, Blackhorse-street, where he, his father, and brother wrought at roller-making. His attention and industry raised him to the position of piece-master; and he commenced also a small business on his own account, to which he devoted his leisure hours. He subsequently took premises in Hanover-street, and on the death of his brother Thomas, which occurred about 22 years ago, he was joined in partnership with Mr. James Galloway. About 13 years ago Mr. Taylor went into partnership with Ald. Richard Harwood, and a large cotton-spinning mill was built at Brownlow-fold. In 1863, the firm erected a new mill, and Mr. Taylor then retired from the business, his sons, Charles, Frank, and William, entering the mill as Messrs. C. Taylor and Brothers, and succeeding to their father's share of the business. Mr. Taylor's partnership with Mr. Galloway terminated at Christmas, 1866, and from that time to his death he occupied his time variously, but always usefully. He has been a member of the Town Council since the 21st November, 1862, till 1868. He did not then offer himself for re-election, but was selected as one of the aldermen of the ward. His connection with the Council, as well as his position of director of the Bolton Gas Company, Bolton Waterworks, and Farnworth Gas Company, gave him opportunities of counselling economy, and imparting prudent and wise advice, which earned for him the unsought reputation of being thoroughly sound and judicious. He was a member of the Unitarian congregation and one of the trustees of Bank-street chapel, and, says the Bolton Guardian, was an ardent supporter of everything that was good.

FIRESIDE READINGS.

NATURE'S HOMILIES.

WERE I, O God, in churchless lands remaining,
Far from all voice of teachers and divines;
My heart would find in flowers of Thy ordaining, Priests, sermons, shrines.

Your voiceless lips, O flowers! are living preachers,
Each cup a precept, every leaf a book,
Supplying to my fancy numerous teachers
From loneliest nook.

'Neath cloistered boughs, each floral bell that swingeth
And tolls its perfume on the passing air,
Makes Sabbath in the heart and ever ringeth
A call to prayer;

Not to the domes where crumbling arch and column
Attest the feebleness of mortal hand,
But to that fane most catholic and solemn
Which God hath planned;

To that Cathedral, boundless as our wonder,
Whose quenchless lamps the sun and moon supply,
Its choir the winds and waves, its organ thunder,
Its dome the sky.

Then, amid solitude and shade, I'd wander Through the green aisles, and stretched upon the sod,
Amid the silence reverently ponder
The ways of God.

MAHOMET.

MAHOMET is the only founder of a religion of whose personal appearance we possess authentic details. He was a little above the middle height, strongly but sparsely made, with broad shoulders and a slight stoop; his hair was black, and in the prime of life clustered over his ears; his moustache and beard were also black, the latter abundant and reaching some way down his chest; his forehead was large, with a vein on it, which swelled when he was angry; his complexion was fair for an Arab; his eyes were large, black, and piercing, but bloodshot and restless; his teeth were white and well formed, but stood apart; his walk was so rapid that people had to run to keep up with him, and his gait is described as being like that of a man striding down hill. He was simple in his apparel; he never wore silk but once in his life, and then threw it aside in disgust, saying it was no fit dress for a man. His general attire was white and red or striped cotton; like all Arabs, he had no taste for comfort, and the luxurious refinements of artificial life were not known to him, or would have been despised had they become so; a bed of palm-tree fibre, a low hut of burnt tiling with a palm-tree roof would have been by him preferred to a palace. Still he was in some things of extremely delicate and sensitive taste, as in the use of perfumes and in his distaste for unpleasant odours. At Medina he once sent back a dish of mutton to the sender untouched, because it was flavoured with onions, saying they were disagreeable to the angel who visited him; he never travelled without toothpicks and antimony for his eyes; he was a good listener in conversation, and never in shaking hands was the first to withdraw his own; he was not addicted to any of the games or sports of which the Arabs were passionately fond, and was, in all things, most unlike the heroic idea of Arab character.

WOMAN'S SPHERE.

WE take the following from an article on "Woman" in Cassell's Magazine:—"If the human race is to be perpetuated—if generation is to follow generation as heretofore—if men and women are to marry, and children are to be born into the world, it is very clear to us that home duties must continue to occupy woman's chief if not her sole attention. If the human race is to be perpetuated, there must be children; and if children, they must be nursed and trained with tenderness and skill. There will always be sick people, and sick people will require to be tended. There will be death-beds, and death-beds require that some one should minister by them. It will not be seriously proposed that such work should be deputed to men while women are released for more honourable occupations. The human race would fare badly by that exchange. Woman may be able to do man's work as well as he can, but he certainly cannot so well do hers. It would be as unsuitable as unseemly to have man's rougher, stronger hand dressing and undressing the tender infant form, while woman's was engaged in wielding either the pen or the sword. It would be no improvement on our present arrangements to have the husband at home keeping the children quiet, putting the little ones to bed, and diverting the elder, while the wife was pleading at the bar or haranguing the senate. The sick and the dying would not profit much by the change were man to become their chief attendant—cooling their brow and smoothing their pillow—while woman was engaged in the bank or the counting-house, speculating on the rise or fall of goods or stocks, making entries of debit and credit. Man has no aptitude for domestic duties, and so long as they require to be done—that is, so long as the world lasts—women will be required to do them. The world can dispense with man's services almost better than with woman's. His have more to do with the accidents, hers more with the essentials of existence. She might, on emergency, take man's place, and fill it passing well; man cannot by any means take hers; he is a very picture of helplessness whenever he makes the attempt; and, spite of the dislike to it which some express, the woman will be in a sorry plight if woman does not make whatever sacrifice of feeling and instinct and talent may be required of her in order to her filling—as she does now wherever she is happiest and most useful—the obscure but not unimportant sphere of home.

HOW A PRISONER WAS SAVED.

In an article on "the Invention of the Compass," in Our Young Folks, Mr. Parton introduces the following curious story, told him by a Lake Champlain boatman:

He said that he had been a prisoner for eleven months in Andersonville during the late war, and when he heard that General Sherman was at Atlanta, about two hundred and forty miles distant, he and his comrade determined to try to escape, and make their way thither. One of them had an old-fashioned watch with a compass in the back of it; and by this they expected to direct their course, which was nearly northwest. But, as they expected to travel only by night, they resolved not to start until they could get a box of matches, so as to be able to strike a light now and then, to look at their compass. They delayed their departure for six weeks, trying to get a box of matches, for the purchase of which they gave one of their negro friends their last five dollar bill. He could not buy a box of matches for five dollars, nor for any other number of dollars, and so at last they made up their minds to start without them.

Assisted by their black friend, they got away one afternoon, and lay hidden until late in the evening, when they started at a great pace through the woods, and came about midnight to a road which seemed to go, as nearly as they could guess, exactly northwest. Seemed, I say; but it might not, and, if it did not, it would lead them to capture and death. The night was not very dark, but the stars were hidden by clouds; else the friendly North Star would have guided them upon their way. Anxious as they were to get on, they stood for several minutes comparing recollections, and debating the great question upon which their lives depended. But, the more they talked it over, the more uncertain they became; and now they bitterly regretted their impatience in coming away without matches.

There was a great number of fireflies flying about. A lucky thought occurred to one of them, the boatman who told us the story. He caught a firefly, and taking it between his thumb and finger, held it over his compass. Imagine their joy to find that the insect gave them plenty of light for their purpose; and imagine their still greater joy to discover that the road led straight to the Union army. Eight nights of travel brought them safely to it.

BOOKS AND THOUGHTS.

BY ROBERT LEIGHTON.

As round these well-selected shelves one looks,
Remembering years of reading leisure flown;
It kills all hope to think how many books
He still must leave unknown.

But when to thoughts instead of books he comes,
Regret grows less for what he cannot read,
If he reflects how many learned tomes
One thought may supersede.

So, let him be a toiling unread man,
And the idea, like an added sense,
Of God informing all his life, he can
With many a book dispense.

The fine conviction, too, that death, like sleep,
Wakes into higher dream—this thought will brook
Denial of the libraries, and keep
The key of many a book.

VELOCIPEDES.

Of this new machine Josh Billings, the American humourist, says:—"It don't take much stuff to build a filoped. I am bold tew say that a man could make one ov 'em out of a single old plank, and then hev enough stuff left over to splinter broken limbs, or make, perhaps, a coffin. A filoped can't stand alone, and that single fact is enuff to condemn the thing in mi eye. I don't want to hev anything to do with any hopeless critter that can't stand alone, unless, I might add, it is a purty woman going for to faint. I don't think it will ever get intew general use among farmers, az it haz no conveniences for a hay riggin, nor even a place to strap a trunk; and az tew going tweg church on it, the family would hev tew go one at a time, and the rest walk. So of course the thing is killed in that direction."

CHURCH SLEEPERS REPROVED.

THE Dundee Advertiser says that, on Sunday afternoon, the clergyman officiating in one of the Forfar Established Churches suddenly paused in the middle of a lively discourse, and, after an interval, addressed the congregation in the following terms:—"I was once preaching in a rev. doctor's pulpit in Glasgow, and, on returning to the manse, complained to him of the number of people I had seen asleep in the church during my sermon. He replied very sternly—'If the people were asleep, it was your fault.' I am not prepared to admit that it is my fault on the present occasion." This reproof had the effect of rousing some persons who had been oblivious during the former part of the rev. gentleman's discourse.

SCHOOLBOY PHILOSOPHY.

In his "Diary," from which we have given so many extracts, Mr. Crabb Robinson tells this anecdote of Horne Tooke as both very characteristic and probable. At school, he was asked why he put a word in some case or mood, and answered, "I do not know," for which he was instantly flogged. Another boy was then asked, who repeated the grammatical rule, and took his place in the class. On this Tooke cried. His master asked him what he meant, and Tooke said, "I knew the rule as well as he did, but you did not ask for the rule, but the reason. You asked why it is so, and I do not know that now." The master is said to have taken him aside, and given him a Virgil in memory of the injustice done him, of which Virgil Tooke was very proud.

INTELLIGENCE.

BALLYMONEY.—On Sunday, July 11th, the old "Psalms and Paraphrases" in sole use up to this date, were supplemented by "Hymns for Christian Worship," edited by members of the Non-Subscribing Presbyterian Church of Ireland. The event was marked by the introduction of a new choir, numbering upwards of 20 junior members of the congregation.

BLACKLEY.—The congregation and other friends of the Rev. Joseph Freeston assembled at tea on Saturday evening, the 7th inst., to celebrate the commencement of his ministry here. Mr. Bennett, who presided, read an account of the original gift of land and the erection of the chapel in 1697 with other particulars, which were listened to with much interest. Mr. Thomas Cooke and Mr. John Hall offered, on behalf of the congregation, a sincere welcome to Mr. Freeston. Some pleasant music was given during the evening.

BELFAST.—A gathering of schools connected with the Non-Subscribing body took place on Saturday, July 31st, at Scrabo—a spot, for beauty of aspect and extent of prospect, almost unrivalled in the North of Ireland. A considerable number left the County Down station by rail, being joined on the line at Comber by other schools from that place and its vicinity, whilst the Newtownards school and friends met the cortège at the terminus. Messrs. Ritchie and Jackson had, with great and considerate kindness, thrown open their extensive quarries for the accommodation of expected visitors. The great drum-way over which the stones travel in their descent from the quarry to the level, and which, from the foot of the mountain, appears nearly perpendicular, was turned into a common road for pedestrians, and afforded a magnificent sight, being filled from end to end with a slowly moving mass of human beings, all bent on reaching the top, though many of them found it no easy matter. But the toil of ascending was amply recompensed by the splendid views which met the eyes on all sides. Refreshments and everything, so far as the children were concerned, were inclusive of their railway tickets, provided for them by subscription. It is calculated that from twelve to fourteen hundred persons were present on the spot, all of whom seemed to enter heartily into the feelings of satisfaction. Among the ministers present were—Revs. J. Porter, J. Jellie, T. Bowring, J. M'Dowell, Belfast; J. Orr, Comber; D. Thomson, Moneyrea; W. O. McGowan, Ravara; H. Moore, Newtownards; J. McCaw, Killinchy; and W. Cochrane, England.

CREWE.—The Rev. B. Glover has resigned the office of missionary to the Liverpool District Missionary Association, and will bring his work at Crewe to an end in January next.

KIRKCALDY.—On Tuesday last, the Rev. H. Williamson paid a visit to this town for the purpose of initiating a movement for the introduction of Unitarian views. He had received no invitation, and no promise that he would have any one to listen to him. At the hour fixed about 45 intelligent men, with a solitary female, formed the audience, who listened to a lecture upon Unitarian Christianity with the greatest attention. At the close of the lecture questions or discussion was invited, and several texts were presented for explanation. That 1 John v. 7, is a forgery appeared to be simply news to the whole present. There was an evident feeling in favour of another meeting being held. At the close some gentlemen gave in their names as willing to help to arrange for future lectures.

PARK LANE, NEAR WIGAN.—On Monday, the 2nd inst., the scholars of the Park Lane Sunday-schools had their annual treat. After a procession of about 300 children, &c., through the village, headed by Sir Robert Gerard's band, whose services were gratuitously given, they had tea, and then adjourned for the evening to a field kindly lent by David Shaw, Esq.

ROTTERHAM.—On a recent Thursday the children of the day and Sunday-schools, to the number of 100, were favoured by the liberality of the congregation with a delightful excursion to Roche Abbey, £7. 8s. 6d. having been subscribed for the purpose at a vestry meeting, and waggons to convey the children kindly offered by two members, Messrs. Robinson and Husband. About 40 or 50 members of the congregation availed themselves of the occasion to have a pleasant social excursion along with the children.

STOURBRIDGE.—At the monthly meeting of Protestant Dissenting ministers of Warwickshire and the neighbouring counties, held at Stourbridge, August 10, 1869, resolutions were unanimously passed in respectful remembrance of the late Rev. Robert Brooke Aspland and the Rev. William McKean, of Oldbury, and also a resolution of rejoicing on the passing of the Irish Church Act.

SWINTON.—The new organ, which has cost £130, built by Messrs. Kemble and Johnson, of Manchester, was opened on Sunday, August 8th, when sermons were preached by the Rev. John Wilson, of Birmingham, to large congregations. Mr. Thos. Rawson presided at the organ. The collections amounted to £8. 1s. 7d. On Monday, August 9th, a tea party was held, about 110 being present. After tea Mr. William Harrison presided; and, after congratulating the meeting on obtaining the beautiful instrument before them, cautioned them not to allow it to take the place of their own voices, but merely to lead their singing, and thereby add to the beauty and harmony of their worship. Mr. Henry Ermen proposed, and Mr. W. Collier seconded, a vote of thanks to Mr. Wilson for his services of the previous day, to which Mr. Wilson replied in a brief and effective speech. The Revs. Brooke Herford and T. E. Poynting addressed the meeting, and a vote of thanks was unanimously given to Mr. Thos. Rawson for presiding at the organ on Sunday. Mr. Kershaw and Mr. Farn also addressed the meeting.

TODMORDEN.—The school sermons in connection with the Unitarian church of this place were preached on Sunday last by the Rev. J. Page Hopps, of Dukinfield, when collections to the amount of £32 were made on behalf of the school. The old chapel is being rapidly transformed into school and class-rooms; when the work is completed the large and flourishing Sunday-school will find excellent accommodation within its walls.

IN REFERENCE

To WINE it is a fact that many persons are pleased if they can say "We import our own." They have an impression that by so doing they not only get it cheaper but purer; and, besides, there is the honour of importing. They overlook altogether that those Foreign Dealers who seek them out are quite aware of this amiable weakness, and do not fail to take advantage of it to add some shillings to the price. To assist the impression they judiciously insinuate that their article is purer than what usually comes to England, and thus they lull that desire for comparison which would soon dispel the delusion.

These remarks apply specially to GERMAN WINES,

And, in proof of them, we would ask those Gentlemen who buy such Wines to compare our

WHAT THE CHURCHES ARE DOING.

The Rev. Charles Kingsley has consented to preside over the Education department of the Social Science Association at the forthcoming Congress to be held at Bristol between the 29th of September and the 6th of October next.

The Bishop of Natal is slowly recovering from a severe attack of rheumatic fever. Our readers may remember that he was nearly drowned last spring in crossing a swollen river on horseback during a visitation of his diocese. Letters written in the beginning of June state that he was then still unable to leave his room.

The Dean and Chapter of Exeter have resolved upon the alteration and complete restoration of the choir of Exeter Cathedral, at a cost of upwards of £12,000. A few years ago Mr. Gilbert Scott made a report of all the works necessary to be done in the restoration of this cathedral. His estimate was a very large one, and the work which is now to be done to the choir forms a part only of Mr. Scott's plan. Towards the sum required the Chapter subscribes £3,000; the Bishop of Exeter, £1,000; the Dean, £1,000; Chancellor Harington, £500; the Archdeacon of Exeter, £500; the Archdeacon of Barnstaple, £300; Canons Cook and Lee, £300 each; and the Bishop of Ely, £100. The side aisles will be thrown into the choir to increase the accommodation at morning service.

Much excitement has been occasioned at Market Harborough by the committal to prison of the Rev. J. C. Milbourne, the leader of the "Hallelujah Band" from Leicester. Mr. Milbourne, with Mr. Joseph Sharman, were charged with obstructing the highway by preaching in the wide open space called the Sheep Market on week-day evenings. The pretended "obstruction" was accepted by the local magistrates as proved on the testimony of Police Superintendent Iliffe. The magistrates fined each of the defendants 5s. with costs, which amounted to more than a sovereign in each case. Mr. Sharman's fine was paid with notice of appeal. Mr. Milbourne refused to pay a farthing, and was sent to prison for seven days. The neighbouring inhabitants have put out a bill declaring that no obstruction or annoyance was caused by Mr. Milbourne's preaching in the square in front of their houses. They add: "Whatever disturbances have taken place have, in our opinion, been caused entirely by the outrageous conduct of a band of men who appear to have determined to stop, by noise and tumult, the right of an Englishman to address such of his fellow-citizens as choose to listen, on such subjects as he or they may deem of importance. And we hereby express our sympathy with Mr. Milbourne in the imprisonment to which the magistrates have this day condemned him, and our opinion that if this conviction be legal, the state of the law requires immediate attention and amendment."

A number of leading laymen of the Baptist body have resolved to undertake the formation of a ministerial sustentation fund. The chief ministers of the denomination have set their names down as subscribers. They say that their object is "to induce and assist churches of the Baptist denomination to provide an honourable maintenance for their ministers." They propose the following rules:

"All churches contributing not less than £10 per annum (such contribution to include the subscriptions of individuals) shall be members of the society. That the fund shall be administered by a committee consisting of not fewer than twenty, who shall be elected at the annual meeting.

"The committee shall be empowered to decline or to return the contribution of any church; but shall, in every such case, submit its decision for confirmation or reversal to the annual meeting.

"The income of the society, after deducting working expenses, shall be distributed in equal sums amongst the ministers of contributing churches, whose stipends shall not be less than £75 or more than £150 a year.

"A meeting of the ministers and deacons of contributing churches shall be held annually (preferably, when convenient, during the autumnal session of the Baptist Union), for the purpose of receiving report and accounts, and electing the committee."

During the approaching session of the Baptist Union, which will be held at Leicester, those who are favourable to the plan will meet and complete the organisation. We imagine, however, that the plan of giving all subscribing congregations a right of equal sharing in the fund will break down in practice.

Sir Francis Goldsmid sends to the Times a letter which he has received from Moldavia relative to the persecution of the Jews in that principality. The Minister of the Home Department has ordered the Jews to be ejected from the villages, and families accustomed to every domestic comfort have in consequence been driven from their homes, and obliged to wander about houseless, not having been allowed time even to collect the remnants of their portable property. Women in the agonies of childbirth were dragged away from their couches, and to add to the offensiveness of the persecution most of these ejections took place on the festival of Pentecost and subsequent Sabbaths. The Roumanians even watched their opportunities on Fridays to throw the unbaked Sabbath loaves out of the ovens and cast them on the dunghills.

The Austrian Government is by no means inclined to pass lightly over the Cracow scandal, and if it was the excited state of public feeling would not permit it. The lady superior of the convent will be prosecuted and the nuns will be compelled to give testimony at the trial. The governor of Cracow has been required to report if there are any reasons why the annual subvention of 1,800 florins hitherto paid to the Carmelite community in that city should be continued, and whether, indeed, the nunnery itself should be allowed to remain, more-over the Ministers of Public Worship and Justice have issued a decree limiting the power of the bishops to imprison priests and members of religious orders to cases where the persons so condemned voluntarily submit, and it is not improbable that an official inspection of all convents will be ordered; meanwhile the feeling of the Papal Court towards Austria is indicated by the announcement that the Bishop of Linz, who was recently imprisoned for disobedience to the Austrian laws, is to be made a cardinal.

A remarkable letter on the state of religion in Germany appears in the Times of Saturday from its Berlin correspondent. On Sunday week, in the Cathedral at Berlin, during the recital of the Creed, a young man, rising from a front seat, called the clergyman a liar, and discharged a pistol at his breast. The clergyman was not hurt, but a chorister boy was slightly wounded. The next moment the assassin was in the hands of the sexton, and quietly suffered himself to be led away to the vestry. He is not apparently a lunatic, but seems to have acted under a fanatical idea that the clergy are deceivers, and that it was his duty to do some striking deed to draw public attention to the fact. His statement at the police-office is set out in full. He said:

"My name is Biland. I am 19 years of age, a Protestant, and the son of a blacksmith in the village of Lank, county of Lower Barnim, a few miles from Berlin. My parents sent me to a grammar school, wishing me to become a candidate for the ministry in the Established Church. But my eyes were soon opened to the falsehood of the creed I was expected some day to teach, and my dislike was increased to disgust when I perceived that many of those professing to believe it were liars at heart. I refused to pursue a career which had become so hateful to me, and resisted all attempts of my parents to force me to persevere. Eventually I saw myself left by them to my own devices, and began to study art—the dramatic art, I mean. I wished to become an actor, and to preach to the public in my own way; but the religious mendacity rampant around me gave me no rest. Some I saw uttering deliberate untruths, while others, knowing them to be such, listened with contemptuous indifference. Gradually I taught myself that some striking deed was indispensable to rouse the public mind from its apathy, and chase away the mists of superstition. I therefore determined to seize the first favourable opportunity that offered for shooting a clergyman while in the act of uttering his accursed perjuries. I have done it. I have myself cast the ball and done my best to render the shot fatal. I am sound in body and mind, and scorn the suggestion that I have acted under the disturbing influence of temporary insanity. I perfectly knew what I was about, and am convinced there are many able to comprehend the disinterestedness of my purpose, though they may, perhaps, not approve the method chosen to compass it. My design was to shoot Mr. Heinricl, and I was prepared to pay the penalty of the deed."

The narrator of the story is afraid the prisoner was right in supposing that many will appreciate his motive, though they will abhor the deed. The fact is, he says, and he amplifies the statement in two columns of letterpress, that with very few exceptions the German people have ceased to believe in Christianity. They do not hate it, but regard it as a mere Asiatic religion which is dying out of itself. The Government, indeed, compels every child to learn the catechism, but so convinced are the people that it will be no sooner learned than disbelieved, that they do not even take the trouble to remonstrate against the imposition. It is taken for granted that the boy of 15 has learned to reject what he was taught as a child of 10. Mr. Ernest de Bunsen, however, denies the truth of this account in a subsequent letter. He admits that the Germans have to a great extent rejected Christianity as taught by Rome and as taught by Luther. What the sort of Christianity is which they have embraced instead the writer does not tell us. Mr. de Bunsen assumes that the Times correspondent is an Englishman, who has not been long enough in Germany to know what he is writing about. The Times, however, in a note, states that the correspondent is a German and a Prussian, who has lived much longer in Germany than Mr. de Bunsen.

The great convent case, Saurin v. Starr, is, it seems, to be heard again. On Wednesday application was made to the chief clerk of Vice-Chancellor Malins for the production of documents preparatory to the hearing of the cause.

No progress has been yet made, according to the correspondent of the Pall Mall Gazette, towards the formation of a representative Church body in Ireland, nor is there an agreement on the principles upon which it should be constituted. The columns of the Protestant press continue to be filled with suggestions on the subject, many of them sufficiently absurd. It appears to be taken for granted that the bishops will hold their own purely clerical synods, leaving the laity to seek for themselves a mode of representation. The rumour is still current that the Dukes of Leinster and Abercorn are to call a lay meeting on the subject, but nothing has yet been determined upon. There is a very general feeling among the country clergy in favour of "commutation," and it is believed by many Churchmen that on the Church bodies coming into existence a considerable reduction in the actual number of clergy in charge of parishes will be the first result of the change, and that this will enable a concentration of parishes on a large scale to be effected in the less populous districts.

Dr. Cumming has already made it known that he means to attend the Pope's Council, at least if he can get a safe-conduct, for it seems from a letter he has addressed to the Times, that his presence at Rome depends in some measure upon his being assured that he will not be dealt with as John Huss was. How the doctor wrote to Archbishop Manning, and how the Archbishop sent him a courteous reply and a copy of one of his books, has been some time a matter of history, but it was not known until now that Dr. Cumming had addressed the Pope himself "in the accustomed ecclesiastical Latin and form" (the letter is set out in the Times). The Holy Father has not yet replied, but in case his reply is of a favourable character, Dr. Cumming does not doubt that he will get it in time to be at Rome for the opening of the Council. "I am persuaded," he adds, "that if you send, as you no doubt will, a reporter to the successive meetings of the Council, he will not be able to report any language used by me or the others inconsistent with the courtesy we owe or the respect we feel to the Sovereign Pontiff and the assembled prelates."

Two special cases of discipline have occupied the attention of the Wesleyan Conference. The first was that of Mr. Arthur Ransom, a young preacher, who, in answer to the yearly question, "Do you continue to hold our doctrines?" has had to explain that he slightly differs from them on the Sabbath question, holding the obligation of Sunday as a Christian observance, but regarding the Sabbath as a Jewish institution abolished by the Gospel. Mr. Ransom has had in consequence to withdraw. The other case was that of the Rev. Thomas Hughes, a member of Conference, who, in a book published last year, advocated the view that attendance at the "class meetings" ought not to be a condition of membership in the Methodist churches; and a committee to whom the matter had been referred, after expressing a strong opinion that by so doing Mr. Hughes attacked a vital part of the Church discipline, recommended that the rev. gentleman should be declared incapable of holding the office of superintendent while he maintained his present opinions. At the close of a lengthened discussion, in the course of which Mr. Hughes defended his position, maintaining that the view he took was a debatable one, the report was almost unanimously adopted.

The name of the Dean of Canterbury appears in the list of vice-presidents of the newly-organised Protestant Dissenters' grammar school at Mill Hill. The prospectus states that the school is to be conducted henceforth on "broad and liberal principles."

The Dean of Windsor has done away with a great scandal. He has issued notices that St. George's Chapel will in future be open to visitors every week-day from twelve till four, and that the officials are forbidden to receive any gratuity.

The story of the imprisoned nun of Cracow has led to a very important anti-clerical agitation, both in Austria and Hungary. In the latter country especially it has given additional strength to the opposition which has for some time been growing up there against the pretensions of the Roman Catholic Church, and the Hungarian press now not only demands the suppression of all convents and monasteries but also the abolition of the celibacy of the clergy. On this subject the New Free Lloyd remarks that shortly before the Council of Trent the Hungarian clergy themselves asked for the removal of the restrictions as to marriage, and that the four Hungarian bishops who took part in that Council did their utmost to obtain the fulfilment of this wish, but failed—in consequence, as they said, of the opposition of the Jesuits. The Hungarian Parliament, too, has repeatedly urged that clerical celibacy should cease to be compulsory. In Italy the civil courts have already in upwards of 50 cases declared that Roman Catholic priests are free to marry, and it is urged that a similar decision should be given by the Hungarian tribunals. Other religious reforms, such as the introduction of civil marriages, and of the election of bishops by the members, both clerical and lay, of dioceses, are also being asked for.

The autumnal Session of the Congregational Union is to be held at Wolverhampton. The annual sermon to the Union will be preached in the Queen-street Chapel on the evening of Monday, October 18, by the Rev. R. A. Redford, M.A., of Hull. The Session will open the next morning, and a provisional scheme of business has already been drawn up. The claims of missions will be brought prominently before the Union; the Continental Evangelical Society, the Pastor's Retiring Fund, and Chapel Building Societies, will also be kept in mind. Then come proposals for new efforts, such as the suggested Chapel Insurance Society, but especially the Ministerial Sustentation Fund, as to which the special committee appointed in May will be ready with a report, and will be prepared to propose immediate steps for the formation of such a fund. Papers will be read on "How we may best avail ourselves of the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge for the education of our ministers," by Mr. Neville Goodman; by Dr. Morton Brown on "A possible basis of union between Congregationalists and Presbyterians;" and by the Rev. E. R. Conder, of Leeds, on "The Church and the Congregation." Mr. J. A. Cooper, of Birmingham, has also been asked to read a paper on retaining the elder scholars in our Sunday-schools, and the Rev. R. Balmagne another on "The promotion of spiritual life in our churches in the new conditions of society." It is proposed to hold a public meeting in Queen-street Chapel on the Tuesday evening, and a meeting for working men next evening in the Agricultural Hall. A conversazione in the Corn Exchange will wind up the general meetings of the Union on Thursday evening. We are glad to hear that the Rector of Wolverhampton, the Rev. J. H. Iles, has expressed his desire to reciprocate the hospitality which Dissenters of that town showed when the Church Congress recently assembled there. He will himself accommodate a couple of visitors, and recommends his friends to do likewise.

The Irish Protestant bishops are again in deliberation in Dublin, and it is understood that an address, something in the shape of a pastoral to the Protestant clergy and laity, is being prepared by them.

A correspondent of the Church News writes that he attended three City churches in succession last Sunday morning. In one of them he found an old woman and the charity children; in another, there was no service at all; and at the third, up to the time at which he left it, no clergyman had arrived.

With regard to the Pope's Council, the North German Gazette has published an article in which it says that all the Governments of Northern and Southern Germany are fully agreed as to their attitude towards the Council. Should its decisions imperil peace between the temporal and spiritual powers, the Governments are thoroughly determined to resist all encroachments of the Holy See.

On the last night of the Session Mr. McArthur asked what course the Government intended to take in relation to the Jamaica Clergy Act. Mr. Monsell answered that by this Act, which expires this year, more than £20,000, raised out of the taxes of the colony, was appropriated to religious purposes:

"By the census of 1861 it appeared that there were in Jamaica 40,000 members of the Anglican Church, 42,000 Methodists, 51,530 Baptists, and 30,000 belonging to other religious denominations. Of this sum of £20,000, all except £370 went towards the maintenance of the Church of England. Under these circumstances it had been determined to introduce religious equality into that colony, and instructions had been issued to the Government to the effect that Her Majesty's Government were of opinion that the moral and religious culture of the subject race of the island, and not the ascendancy of any one portion of the community, should be the object of the Government, and that it would be desirable to avoid all appearance of showing exclusive favour to any one denomination. No scheme had yet been submitted by the Governor, but one was expected to arrive by the next mail, and it would be founded on the principle just mentioned."

WHAT IS SAYING ON CHURCH MATTERS.

The Spectator admits that Liberals are under a strong temptation to agree with Mr. Hadfield's proposition that the bishops "should be relieved from the duty of attendance in the House of Lords." There is, however, something to be said on the other side. We may remove the bishops, indeed, but whither? To some place in which, whether or no it be formally recognised by the Constitution, they will probably wield more power than they now possess, while they will certainly have less insight into the wants of the time, and find every tendency to narrowness, bigotry, and sacerdotalism multiplied tenfold. We do not want men so powerful as our bishops must be, to be modelled either after the type with which the Evangelical, or after that with which the High-Anglican theory would accord. We do not want them to be mere preachers or theologians or ecclesiastical men of business, in whom all the faults and littlenesses of the average clergyman would be intensified by the influences of power and dignified position; we do not want them to be great spiritual magnates, enemies or allies, as the case might be, but always rivals of the representatives of temporal power. We prize the secularising agencies which for bid them to be either the one or the other. As it is a salutary thing for the bishop's wife and daughters to descend for a while from the solitary eminence of the cathedral town to the level of the London season, to see about them many equals and not a few superiors, to find their mitre insignificant among the multitude of coronetted panels, so in a higher degree and in a higher sense it is salutary for his lordship to meet his peers in Parliament. It is not only that he finds his own level, and learns to measure himself with some of the ablest men of the day, though these are the most salutary of lessons for one who has to rule; he learns to accept facts, and to recognise necessities; he sees and can scarcely fail to acquire some measure of the virtues which we may call specially lay virtues—moderation and justice. He is absolutely forced into something at least of a statesman-like breadth of view where the interests of his own order and of the commonwealth impinge upon each other; he does not, we may hope, wholly unlearn his lesson when he returns to his own peculiar province of duty. With all this, however, the Spectator is constrained to allow that if the bishops show themselves unable to see beyond the interests of their order and of their communion, the voice, not of a sect, but of the people, will before long "relieve them from the duty of attendance in Parliament."

The passage of the Bishops' Resignation Bill through committee occasioned so much laughter, says the English Independent, that one might suppose a farce was being acted rather than any piece of a tragical or serious nature. In the words of the Premier, the measure is designed to bring to an end the system of "stop-gap," "make-shift," and "stray bishops from the colonies" employed by the families of superannuated bishops. The first laugh was raised by Mr. Dickinson, who declared against coadjutors, and said "what they wanted was the real article." Mr. Hadfield unintentionally raised a second laugh by very seriously declaring that all recent experience went to show that "there would be no rest for the Prime Minister till he had removed the whole bench from the House of Lords." With equal seriousness Mr. Gladstone, as a sincere Churchman, reminded some irreverent members that the Church of England is episcopal, and that, whether rightly or wrongly, it was generally assumed that, in such a Church, bishops were of some use; but even he was met with a laugh. He avenged himself, however, with never-failing adroitness; for to those who hinted at the successors of the Apostles being put upon the same commons as the Apostles themselves, he replied with Burke that while it might be the duty of bishops to live in the spirit of evangelical poverty, it was, although the laity might not be aware of it, their duty also. The question that Mr. Hadfield had imported wholesale came up in detail under a proposal by Sir Wilfrid Lawson to omit from the "privileges" of a bishop who should retire from mental infirmity that of continuing to sit in the House of Lords. This gave rise to a very delicate question—How far a madman or an imbecile might fulfil Parliamentary duties. The Prime Minister admitted the anomalousness of a man not in his right mind retaining a seat in a deliberative assembly; but he finished his sentence in terms which may give more offence than his aeronautical metaphor. "It would be an extraordinary course," he suggested, "to shut bishops out for mental infirmity, while lay peers under similar circumstances were allowed to remain." Thus Sir Wilfrid was laughed out of his amendment, and a mad bishop will count for as much as all the wisdom under a law lord's wig.

In preaching the other day at Great Yarmouth, the Dean of Ely said it would be absurd to deny that recent legislation must have an influence upon the Church of England in her relations to the State. He considered, however, that the Establishment was in greater danger from "horrible internal divisions" than from outward attacks.

As straws which show which way the current moves in a question which will be one of the next, the remarks of the secular press on the attitude of the bishops in the House of Lords through the late debate are by no means devoid of significance. For instance, take the following from the Pall Mall Gazette:

"A word may be said here on the part taken by the bishops in regard to the bill. To our minds, the most marked thing about the debates in the Lords was the profound disbelief in the vitality of Anglicanism in Ireland which seemed to animate the episcopal bench. The bishops took their stand on money because they scarcely attempted to disguise even from their adversaries that money was absolutely essential to the well-being of the Church whose interests they had to defend. From the inferior clergy in Ireland a very different note has been heard. Their indignation at imagined injustice has not led them to despair of their ecclesiastical future, and if the conduct of the battle had been committed to the Protestants of Ireland it would never have been reduced to a mere struggle for pounds, shillings, and pence. The difference is striking and, we suspect, significant. In some form or other the Irish Church will no doubt survive its disestablishment. But the poorer the Church is in realised wealth, the more popular it is likely to become in organisation, and the changes it is hereafter destined to undergo will possibly affect nothing so much as the position and power of the bishops. Perhaps they felt as by instinct that in fighting for endowments they were really fighting for life."

Dr. Cumming's letter to the Pope furnishes a topic to most of the papers. The Times regards the letter which it published on Tuesday from Dr. Cumming to the Pope as the first part of a remarkable correspondence, and thinks that readers may possibly look with some interest for its conclusion. That the doctor's letter has not been answered the Times appears to think is due to the fact that the Pope and his advisers are in a little dilemma. It is hardly to be supposed they desire the attendance of Dr. Cumming, but then why did they send him the invitation? Dr. Cumming stands on strong ground. He was invited to attend the Council, and, unless the invitation was a mockery, he must have been invited on terms extending at least to freedom of conference. Dr. Cumming is a fair, indeed an eligible representative of a numerous body of Christians, and he states with great fairness the case between his friends and the Roman Council. "We separated from Rome in the sixteenth century. Rome may fairly invite us once more to return, or give our reasons for standing aloof." The Star says that if Scotchmen suffer a good deal in trying to understand the jokes of other men, they have their revenge; it is exceedingly hard to discover the points of theirs. Dr. Cumming's idea of dealing with the Pope was to send him a Latin letter. He wrote to the Pope as Holy Father, though, of course, he holds it impious in Roman Catholics so to address him. He declared he was grateful for the invitation to the Protestant, though his apparent intention was to bring it into ridicule. He professed an earnest desire to be present at the Council; and after putting to the Pope the question which he had put to Dr. Manning, he subscribed himself "his Holiness's servant." It appears that the Pope has not replied to this eccentric missive. He is a shrewd old gentleman, and probably knows an impertinence when he sees one. The Standard comes the nearest of all to the mark, to our thinking, in saying that Dr. Cumming probably is not in earnest, any more than he is when he asks for an assurance that, if he goes to the Council, he shall not be burnt as a heretic. "In fact his proceedings seem to us to partake rather of the nature of a practical joke, and he writes of Christian charity and Christian unity as though he had his tongue in his cheek the whole time."

COUNTY WORK AMONG THE INDEPENDENTS.

A WRITER in the English Independent gives an interesting account of the way in which Independency has been fostered in Nottinghamshire by a union of its various isolated projects into one scheme:

"Independency in Nottinghamshire has not had a very illustrious history. It is true that its oldest church at Castlegate, which is, like Jerusalem, 'the mother of us all,' was founded as far back as 1655, and that the churches at Moor-green and Sutton-in-Ashfield belong to the same period. But during the whole of the eighteenth century the only chapels built and that still survive were at Keyworth and Mansfield—two in 100 years, making a total of five in all in two centuries!"

"During the first seven-and-twenty years of the present century nine chapels were erected—Retford, Ranskill, Grantham, Newark, James-street and Friar-lane in Nottingham, Selston, Hyson-green, and Worksope; and then followed a long period of inactivity. Forty years rolled over our heads; the population of the county town rose from some 60,000 to 120,000, and its area doubled, largely receding from the three Independent chapels which had, by a strange mischance, all been planted within a stone's throw of each other. In the town of Nottingham in those 40 years one new chapel was built (at Sneinton), and one old one was sold (in Barker-gate). In the county—as distinguished from the town—three new chapels were erected, at Laxton, Tuxford, and Sutton-on-Trent, and two of them were sold, and sold for how much less than they had cost I should be afraid to know."

"The rebuilding of Castlegate Chapel, twice its previous size, in connection with the 1862 Bicentenary, was the beginning of better times. The great difficulty, too, the difficulty felt here, and felt everywhere in undertaking new and aggressive enterprises—of finding men suited to the work—was largely overcome by the establishment of the institute [the Independent equivalent of our Unitarian Home Missionary Board] in the county town, which brought at first 20, then 30, and eventually 50 young men among us who were ready to undertake various kinds of Christian labour, and with whom it was an express law of their life that they should devote a considerable share of their time to works of Christian usefulness."

"No large and general movement had, however, been contemplated till the winter of 1867, when it was suggested that it would be wise to group together the several undertakings already projected, and any others that could be originated, and to raise a common fund to carry them through. . . . A private conference sanctioned the project and recommended that it be submitted to a conference of representatives from all the churches in the county."

"The public assembly, presided over by Mr. Samuel Morley, cordially approved the undertaking, and decided that a sum of not less than £10,000 should be raised in five years, to be devoted, not to ordinary purposes of church revenue, but to the erection or enlargement of chapels, mission-rooms, and schools, to the liquidation of debts, and to other special denominational objects in the county. It was also provided that any one contributing to the fund should reserve the power to appropriate the amount to such object or objects as he preferred."

"From that time to this a great change has taken place in the position and prospects of Independency in Nottinghamshire. I do not say that the county scheme has been the parent of all the new enterprises that have been undertaken or are now in contemplation. Some, as I have mentioned, were projected before it was started, and others would have been originated sooner or later apart from it. But, on the other hand, some it has directly originated, others it has largely aided, all it has animated with a loftier spirit, with a deeper inspiration, with a larger charity."

"The enterprises that are now in hand, or just out of hand, or about to be undertaken by the friends of Independency in Nottinghamshire, furnish a striking contrast to the previous condition of things. In the first place, the new Institute has been completed at a cost of more than £6,000, some £2,300 of which has been contributed by Nottinghamshire people. New chapels have been erected at Addison-street, Nottingham, and at Hucknall, Westwood, and Eastwood. Two new chapels are in course of erection at Great Alfred-street, Nottingham, and at Burton Joyce. Sites have been obtained and chapels are about to be commenced at Grantham, Arnold, and Lambley; and a site has been purchased at Worksope, and something obtained towards a new sanctuary. Five other chapel schemes are also in contemplation by Nottinghamshire friends, either in this county or on its immediate confines. In addition to these undertakings several projects for the liquidation of chapel debts have been arranged. Several mission-rooms have also been opened in various parts of the town and county, and the work is being successfully carried on."

RELIGION IN WALES AND DIS-ESTABLISHMENT.

THE Pall Mall Gazette discusses the question of Disestablishment for Wales. Mr. Watkin Williams has announced that on an early day next Session he will move a resolution to this effect. In the mouth of any English member this notice might be regarded as only an attempt to get in the thin end of the wedge. But Mr. Watkin Williams, though a "thorough liberal," as he describes himself in Debrett, is something more substantial than this—a thorough Cambrian. We believe him to be in earnest, and without suspecting him of the slightest anxiety to maintain Church and State anywhere, we fancy that local patriotism lies in all honesty at the bottom of this particular movement. The Welsh have always been a strangely unconformable people in the matter of religious government. Our Plantagenet and Tudor sovereigns made root and branch work of the destruction of their political independence; but, in religious matters, they never were completely subjugated either to Rome or to Canterbury. The clergy of mediæval Wales maintained, as long as they possibly could, the doctrine that the bishops of Saint David's owed no allegiance to any English archiepiscopal see; that they had consecrated suffragans, and exercised all other branches of metropolitical authority, until the reign of Henry I., who forced the Welsh Churches into submission to the see of Canterbury. Being challenged to produce the "Pallium," the well-known symbol of independence, except of Rome, they replied with ready wit that the cathedral of Saint David had possessed one, but that a treacherous clerk carried it off to Brittany. Strange practices, allied to heathenry, seem to have survived in the remoter mountain regions long after the rest of our island had become decently Christian. In the reign of Henry the Eighth a "great lubberly image," as old Fuller styles it, known by the name of Darvell Gatheron, was brought from the diocese of St. Asaph and burnt in Smithfield; the country people (it was reported) used to sacrifice oxen and sheep to it. Bishop Ferrars, of St. David's, who suffered under Queen Mary, whether he was of Welsh extraction or not, certainly did the country justice in the obstinate and crotchety heroism which he displayed. He would agree with nobody. He renounced the Pope, and yet was charged with denying the Royal supremacy. He got into trouble, under King Edward, for moving back to the chancel a communion-table which the ordinary had placed in the middle of the church, and was burnt in the next reign for denying the Real Presence. Dissent, however, and Methodism in particular, effected the conquest of the Principality early in the last century. Howell Harris, of Trevecca, created the sect of Welsh Calvinist Methodists about 1730; and a persuasion so very dear to the national exclusiveness of the people, inasmuch as it repudiates all connection at once with Englishmen and with Wesleyans and other Arminians, made its way with great rapidity. It is at present much the most numerous religious body in Wales, while it exists nowhere else. In a statistical point of view, there is no doubt that Mr. Watkin Williams's motion rests on good grounds. The Church of England in Wales has been, numerically, a failure. According to Mr. Mann's tables (against which, in this case at least, we see no reasonable objection) less than 100,000 attendances at church took place on March 30, 1851, in South Wales, and 400,000 at meeting. In North Wales the numbers were 60,000 and 300,000 respectively. This, in our days, when the current of public opinion runs so strongly against forcing people to do anything or to pay for anything which they dislike, will no doubt appear to many politicians of either over-logical or very yielding dispositions argument enough in favour of the Cambrian voluntary champion. And if used as only part of the general argument against maintaining the Church for the whole country, it is entitled to all attention, and must be met, when the time comes, by such answers as the case demands. But if we regard the application to Parliament as bond fide, as a movement on behalf of Wales and of Wales alone, then it is desirable that no time should be lost in expressing the strongest condemnation of it. It should be regarded as utterly inadmissible, not on Church grounds, but on national. If Wales is entitled to disestablishment, so on the same ground is Cornwall. We cannot allow our unity, such as it is, to be frittered away by subdividing ourselves back into nationalities. We cannot afford to be driven by logic into reconstituting the Heptarchy.

THE WESLEYANS AND THEIR RECENT CONFERENCES.

THIS is the age of Conferences, and the Wesleyan may claim to be their prototype and exemplar. With the Congregationalists and the Baptists, an annual assembly to deliberate on denominational affairs is a well-established institution. The Church of England, in accordance with many other precedents, is following in the wake of her dissenting rivals; and her Congress will precede this year, by only a short space, the Ecumenical Council of the Roman Catholic Church.

Any one will find it an instructive task to read the reports of the Wesleyan Conference just closed. Its proceedings are watched with intense interest by many hundreds of thousands of persons, scattered through most civilised and not a few uncivilised countries, in the different quarters of the world. Its rulers are men of marked ability and unflagging energy, trained to the exercise of power and resolute to retain it; astute and vigorous in administration, and unfaltering in the maintenance of discipline. Perhaps hardly in the Roman Church itself can more notable types be found of the capable, sagacious, and indomitable priest. The Legal Hundred—sitting with closed doors, all laymen and lay influences rigidly excluded—is a conclave possessed of marvellous powers, and exercises an influence like that of a secret consistory. Hitherto it has maintained its mysterious seclusion unchallenged as well as uninvaded. Whether it may do so much longer, is a question that will force itself on every thoughtful observer of its proceedings with increasing doubt. Some attempts have been made to meet the popular demand for a share in deliberations affecting the interests of the body, by the holding of what is called an "Open Conference;" and from the striking ability displayed by some of the speakers, it cannot be but that eventually they must succeed in wresting from the ministerial forces some portion of their power, and in lowering, if not breaking down, the wall of partition between preacher and hearer. Some significant hints in this direction were given by the free canvassing of connexional subjects at the preliminary committees, composed partly of ministers and partly of laymen, which occupy the three days prior to the opening of the technical conference. At one of these committees, indeed, the laity proceeded to formally acknowledge, by a vote of thanks, the services of the President. One of the warier ministers perceived, with the eagle eye of threatened prescription, that if thanking were to be done by the laity, it might be open to them to censure, and a voice in the appointing of the chief officer of the Conference might next be claimed by them too, and thus an important professional prerogative be imperilled. An objection was raised to the whole proceeding; but the laymen who proposed it were very influential men and carried their point. The day of monopoly is even here waning to its close.

In several respects it is remarkable how strongly, and with what augmenting force, the Wesleyans are participating in discouragements experienced by other religious bodies, and which are by some of our friends regarded as exceptionally severe in the Unitarian Church. Like ourselves, they are experiencing an insufficiency of candidates for the ministry:—as indeed are also the Church of England, the Congregationalists, and the Baptists. Like ourselves, they are unable to boast of rapidly increasing numbers; are lamenting the inadequate remuneration of their preachers; are anxious about the retention of their young people in the fold of membership; are discussing the question of allotted seats, and the unsatisfactoriness of present modes of church finance. Nor is the cloven foot of heresy unobtruded even into the sacred precincts of the class leader. The Rev. THOMAS HUGHES has been subjected to inquiry and discipline for the publication of an obnoxious book, and soundly rated for his presumption in raising the mists of doubt over the functions of "experience meetings," which have hitherto glowed in the light of undoubted authority; and the Rev. ARTHUR RANSOM has had to resign for holding that the Jewish Sabbath was abolished by the Gospel, and that Sunday, to which he clings, is a different institution.

But we have observed with special and unqualified pleasure, the vigorous manner in which several of the most prominent and able speakers at the Conference addressed themselves to the question of working-class absenteeism from social worship. Why don't the people attend the public ministrations of religion? Where are our poor on the Sunday? How is it that they come not to our churches and chapels, to blend their voices and prayers with those of their more flourishing neighbours and fellow-citizens? Mr. H. H. FOWLER, of Wolverhampton, a man of great zeal, ability, and influence, declared "that at the present moment they were not touching the masses of the people," "their system was conservative, and they must try some paths which they had not already trodden." He was supported by the Rev. BOWMAN STEPHENSON, B.A., of London, who urged "that the experiment should be tried of a free and unappropriated chapel, in order that the poorest people might feel perfectly free to enter it," and "working people did not want to be pauperised, and were willing to a large extent to support their own religious institutions. A weekly offering, he believed, would meet the expenses of such a place, if it were well worked." The Rev. W. ARTHUR, M.A., an ex-president, "also insisted that this plan of weekly free offerings was the Scriptural plan, and that, indeed, worship was not complete without the offering." The Rev. Dr. OSBOURNE "had long thought that this matter deserved serious consideration, but he had not yet found a place in which the plan had been fairly and successfully tried." Perhaps the able speaker hadn't looked very far afield. A few inquiries more might satisfy him that it is by no means difficult to find such places, but perfectly practicable to show, that a fair and thorough trial—a really well-worked experiment—has invariably been followed by a satisfactory result.

ROUGH NOTES OF A HOLIDAY VISIT TO SOME ENGLISH CATHEDRALS, &c.

NO. IV.—CANTERBURY AND SALISBURY.

ON reaching CANTERBURY, I first inquired my way to St. Martin's, which is certainly the oldest church in England. Its walls, at any rate, were built long ere Norman or even Saxon invader set foot on our soil, by Roman converts, of whom there were many in the Imperial armies, before the arrival here of St. Augustine in the sixth century. I was shown genuine Roman pavement in perfect preservation; the tomb of Queen Bertha, wife of the Saxon King Ethelbert, and other relics of the earliest days of English Christianity. The city has a very old-world, "Sleepy Hollow" appearance. The building still stands, though of course somewhat altered, in which the pilgrims to the shrine of a Beckett used to find their chief hotel accommodation. It is now occupied—"tell it not in Gath!"—as a "baby-linen repository." In many cases the upper tiers of the houses nearly meet over-head; and one could hardly have been surprised to see Chaucer's Canterbury Pilgrims turning the corner of some quaint street:—the Knight, and his son a young Squire; the buxom Wife of Bath and the mincing Prioress; Franklin, Miller, Sompnour, and the rest. At half-past two the bells of the CATHEDRAL began their summons to Sunday evening worship. As I approached the door, my eye was caught by the word Virger,—thus eccentrically spelt as a specimen of "the Dean's English." I was now in the nave, lost in admiration! The marvellous purity of the stone; the loftiness of the arches, and their exceeding elegance of proportion; the magnificent roof, stretching far away; the lustrous beauty of the choir beyond, on some parts of which, a peculiar, almost supernatural shade of colour, reflected from one of the windows, was sleeping—were almost overpowering. Involuntarily I exclaimed: Surely this is the lovely and majestic Queen of all Cathedrals! I was glad to find the "free and open" principle in full operation, and selected my seat with an eye to a favourable position. Hymn-books were scattered about; and it was the first time in my rambles that I found this expression of a desire for congregational worship. I knew the book,—Dr. Alford's,—a fair compilation enough, but containing some lines that by no possibility could have passed the ordeal of Mr. Martineau's critical eye. Here is a couplet, containing about as much poetry as any two lines of an auctioneer's catalogue:

"The circumstances of my crimes,
Their number and their kind," &c.

To my great surprise, and equal pleasure, there was a muster of some 400 people, and when our fine tune "Nottingham" was played over to the hymn, "Prayer is the Christian's vital breath," I sang out as if at home once more. The organ was a puzzle. I could see it nowhere, nor determine whence it sounded. I afterwards learnt that it was up in the clearstory, near the roof; the player nevertheless, being seated among the choristers. There was nothing remarkable in the anthem; the sermon was of the regulation quarter-hour, with the customary maximum of words and minimum of ideas. At the conclusion of the service I had an hour or so of intense interest;—a nearer inspection of the surpassingly lovely choir, of the elegant and spacious nave, and the "long-drawn aisles." We were taken to the spot where Thomas a Beckett was murdered,—the cloister through which he fled to the protection of an altar that had no deterring power for his relentless pursuers; and the side where the knights themselves ran in pursuit of their victim. There remains only a small piece of the stone on which the ambitious but unfortunate priest breathed his last; the blood-stained portions were carried off to Peterborough and other Cathedrals, to be incorporated with their altars, and lend to them an additional element of awe and veneration. We were shown also the tombs of the black Prince, of Henry IV., of the last of the Roman Catholic bishops before the Reformation; monuments of distinguished men of later times; and the spacious cloisters. The Cathedral precincts contain a number of most interesting architectural remains. Altogether, it is a magnificent and marvellous structure, well worthy of a "pilgrimage" from "the uttermost parts of the earth."

SALISBURY CATHEDRAL owes its special interest to the fact, that it is harmonious throughout as to its architecture, being a complete specimen of Early English (1220-1258). The vaulting of the nave is particularly elegant; the choir plain enough, and quite devoid of interest; the chapter-house exceedingly beautiful, and it has just been re-decorated in admirable taste and at great expense. The Lady Chapel is under repair, and couldn't therefore be seen. The verger's story is, that there are in this cathedral as many columns (all of Purbeck marble) as there are hours in the year; as many windows as days; and as many gates as moons. Of the modern tombs, one is erected to commemorate the public spirit and generosity of a citizen, who was described to us by the verger as "the gentleman that rose the Salisbury volunteers." Some fine monuments and tombs of ancient date were explained; "but," I said, "you are forgetting that," pointing to a huge structure, railed in to a height of eight or nine feet, and completely enclosed. "Oh, that is Lord Radnor's pew!" So there the family sit in aristocratic isolation! I concluded that I had certainly now seen the sublimest of all possible illustrations—the very apotheosis—of the pew system. As there were no pews at all till the beginning of the 17th century, and this formidable enclosure looks antique enough, it must surely have been about the first great efflorescence of the new order of exclusiveness, where rich and poor meet together before the Lord, who is the Maker of them all! There is comparatively but little stained glass in this cathedral. In one of the side chapels was shown, in excellent preservation, a piscina (basin or water-drain); an aumbry (cupboard for storing the priests' vestments); and a lavatory in which were cleansed the sacred vessels, and the hands of the ministrants. The cloisters are spacious, and in good preservation. Whilst looking at them, a gentleman who was accompanied by his wife and three children, said to me, "Excuse me, sir, I am an American; have you anything else in this country to equal Salisbury Cathedral?" Whereupon I devoted myself to the sketching out for him of a little tour, say to York, Lincoln, Ely, and Canterbury; and mildly insinuated that by the time he had seen them, he would know where to rank Salisbury, beautiful as it is. The spire is an elegant and graceful piece of work—the highest in England—the vane being 410 feet above the ground. It is said that on its completion there was a second and special consecration of the cathedral. I attended the evening service, which was but indifferently performed, and as respects the congregation! it was almost literally a case of two or three being gathered together. The organ is the poorest I have heard at any of the Cathedrals, and the singing the worst. It was pleasant to emerge from the bare semblance of worship within, to the sweet summer air and verdant carpet of the "Close," where are a number of those cosy-looking, old-world houses, buried in flowers, which I had so often admired before. I shouldn't omit to mention also, a goodly row of coach-houses and stabling, belonging to the dignitaries of the Cathedral, built, I suppose, in the style of those possessed, in their day, by Peter, Paul, and John!—My Cathedral inspections were now for the present at an end, and I betook myself to the hospitable home (one of the most elegant of country mansions) of a friend in Somersetshire. Here, revelling in all the soothing influences of lawn and garden and field, and looking with the wondering gaze of a thorough townsman at the arrangements and processes of a model farm, I enjoyed a couple of days of not unacceptable repose after my pleasant labours. I went, of course, to look at the Unitarian Chapel in the small town hard by. It is, as usual, a small, plain, and very uncathedral-like structure, and bears the simple inscription—1733-1811.—Dissent of any kind, but especially of the Unitarian type, has hard lines in these purely agricultural districts, where the Church dominates over every other interest, and the parson holds the key to social intercourse and local honours. Here the inherent injustice of an established form of religion becomes unmistakably apparent. A Dissenter may live for half a century on a large and valuable estate, employ a considerable number of people on his farms, and have numerous tenants on his different properties. He may be a man of ability, energy, and judgment, and these qualities will secure for him abundance of hard, and not always agreeable work, on Road Trusts, Boards of Guardians, and the like. But, almost invariably, he finds that social rewards and official distinctions, such as there may be (and which none may better afford than he to dispense with), are almost exclusively reserved for the supporters of Church and State principles. We who live in large cities can with difficulty realise the almost Spartan virtue and unflinching devotion to principle, by which alone, in retired and agricultural districts, a man can keep his conscience clear, and follow with undeviating steps its dictates and conclusions. The DIS-ESTABLISHMENT of the CHURCH OF ENGLAND, which cannot now be long postponed, will rectify this and many another injustice, none the less grievous because often borne in dignified silence, and with that just pride of self-respect which scorns to make a personal complaint.

H. R.

P.S.—I had intended to throw together a few observations on the present position of English Cathedrals as religious agencies, and the urgent need in which they stand of radical reforms, to bring them into harmony with modern wants and usages. But I find substantially what I wanted to say so admirably expressed in the current number of "Fraser," by the well-known A. K. H. B., that I gladly append the following corroborative extracts:

"Well, magnificent as are these churches, and grand as is their service, they are a dead failure so far as concerns their influence over the great majority of the people who live round their walls. The stranger delights in them and in their worship; they practically fail to exercise any moral weight upon any but a very little handful of the population of the Cathedral city itself. . . . The week-day service of most Cathedrals is a melancholy sight; specially the morning service. There is not anything that can be called a congregation, and whilst human nature is human nature, those who conduct these services must needs come to conduct them in a perfunctory and listless way. . . . In a town of 7,000 inhabitants, I have seen three individuals besides the officiating clergymen and chorists; in a town of 20,000, ten; and in a town of 60,000, eighteen. The poor, as a general rule, never attend the worship of the Cathedral at all, . . . and the musical service, as a rule, has no attraction for uneducated people. The preaching of the average canon will never come home to anybody. . . . Even the educated classes are not attracted by the week-day services. The fact is, that since the Reformation daily service is a failure, unless in some exceptional place like All Saints', in London. It is most hard to see for whose advantage the cathedral services are kept up. . . . I fear, sorrowfully fear, that the usefulness of cathedrals is outgrown, and their day is past. . . . I wish every inhabitant of every cathedral city loved the worship as George Herbert did the worship at Salisbury long ago. . . . Then, a cathedral is a costly establishment. I am told that to maintain the staff of one costs from £5,000 to £12,000 a year. What is the return for that expenditure? Two daily services, which hardly any mortal will go to!"

Can there be a doubt that the solution of the great and growing question of the English cathedrals, must be looked for in connection with the Dis-establishment of the Church, which at present so woefully fails to turn their magnificent resources to practical account?

HENRY CRABB ROBINSON'S "DIARY."

VI.

ON September 14th, 1826, during his Irish visit, Mr. Robinson travelled with Sheil and a priest, with whom he talked on the stirring topics of the day. He says:

"Sheil did not appear to me a profound or original thinker, but he was lively and amusing. Our priest took a leading part in the conversation. He told us he had had the happiness to be educated under Professor P—— at Salamanca. 'No one,' said he, 'could possibly go through a course of study under him without being convinced that Protestantism is no Christianity, and that Roman Catholicism is the only true religion. Any one who was not convinced must be a knave, a fool, or a madman.' To do justice to Sheil, he joined me in a hearty laugh at this. And we forced the priest at last to make a sort of apology, and acknowledge that invincible ignorance is pardonable. I told him drily that I was a friend to emancipation, but if it should be proposed in Parliament, and I should be there, I should certainly move to except from its benefits all who had studied under Father P—— at Salamanca."

Ten days later, he writes:

"The journey to Belfast on a stage-coach was diversified by my having as companions two reverend gentlemen, whom I suspected to be Scotch seceders,—amusingly, I should say instructively, ignorant even on points very nearly connected with their own professional pursuits. They were good-natured, if not liberal, and with no violent grief lamented the heretical tendencies in the Academical Institution at Belfast. 'It has,' said they, 'two notorious Arians among the Professors, Montgomery and Bruce, but they do not teach theology, and are believed honourably to abstain from propagating heresy.' Arianism, I heard, had infected the Synod of Ulster, and the Presbytery of Antrim consists wholly of Arians. On my mentioning Jeremy Taylor, these two good men shook their heads over 'the Arian.' I stared. 'Why, sir, you know his very unsound work on original sin?' 'I know that he has been thought not quite up to the orthodox mark on that point.' 'Not up to the mark! He is the oracle of the English Presbyterians of the last century.' This was puzzling. At length, however, the mist cleared up. They were thinking of Dr. John Taylor, of Norwich, the ancestor of a family of my friends. And as to Jeremy Taylor, Bishop of Down and Connor, they had never heard of such a man. Yet these were teachers. They were mild enemies of emancipation, and seemed half ashamed of being so, for they had more fear of Arianism than of Popery."

June 18th, 1828, Mr. Robinson was present at the dinner to celebrate the repeal of the Test and Corporation Acts, of which he says:

"A grand dinner was given in Freemasons' Tavern to celebrate a really great event. The Duke of Sussex was in the chair—not a bad chairman, though no orator. Scarcely fewer than 400 persons were present. I went with my brother and the Pattisons, and did not grudge my two guineas, though I was not edified by the oratory of the day. Lord John Russell, as well as Lord Holland, and other great men, spoke (I thought) moderately, while a speech from Aspland was admirable. Brougham spoke with great mastery, both as to style and matter, and Denman with effect. We did not break up till past one. Aspland's was the great speech of the day, and was loudly praised."

Of August 25th, 1828, H. C. R. writes in 1852:

"After a walk of seven leagues, from Luchon to Arreau [in the Pyrenees], we had an agreeable adventure, the memory of which lasted. Shutt and I had reconciled ourselves to dining in a neat kitchen with the people of the house, when a lively-looking little man in black, a sort of Yorick in countenance, having first surveyed us, stepped up and very civilly offered us the use of the parlour, in which were himself and his family. 'We have finished our dinner,' he said, 'and shall be happy to have your company.' The lady was a most agreeable person, and the family altogether very amiable. We had a very pleasant evening. The gentleman was a good liberal Whig, and we agreed so well that, on parting next day, he gave us his card. 'I am a Cheshire clergyman,' he said, 'and I shall be glad to see you at my living [Alderley], if you ever are in my neighbourhood.' When I next saw him he was become Bishop of Norwich. He did not at once recognise me when I first saw him in company with the Arnolds, on my going to see the Doctor's portrait, but Mrs. Stanley did, and young Stanley, the biographer of Dr. Arnold [now Dean of Westminster], and the Bishop afterward showed me courteous hospitality at his palace at Norwich, when the Archeological Institute was held there. This kindness to us strangers in this little adventure in the Pyrenees was quite in harmony with his character. The best of Christian bishops, he was the least of a prelate imaginable; hence he was treated with rudeness by the bigots when he took possession of his bishopric. But he was universally beloved and lamented at his death."

February 15th, 1829, Mr. Robinson made the acquaintance of Mr. Cogan (in whose school the late Premier, Mr. Disraeli, was educated, remaining there till he was articled to a solicitor), under the following circumstances:

"I was engaged to dine with Mr. Wansey at Walthamstow. When I arrived there I was in the greatest distress, through having forgotten his name. And it was not till after half an hour's worry that I recollected he was a Unitarian, which would answer as well; for I instantly proceeded to Mr. Cogan's. Having been shown into a room, young Mr. Cogan came. 'Your commands, sir?' 'Mr. Cogan, I have taken the liberty to call on you in order to know where I am to dine to-day.' He smiled. I went on: 'The truth is, I have accepted an invitation to dine with a gentleman, a recent acquaintance, whose name I have forgotten; but I am sure you can tell me, for he is a Unitarian, and the Unitarians are very few here.' And before I had gone far in my description he said: 'This can be no other than Mr. Wansey. And now may I ask your name?' 'No, thank you; I am much obliged to you for enabling me to get a dinner, but that is no reason why I should enable you to make me table-talk for the next nine days.' He laughed."

"There is no use in your attempting to conceal your name. I know who you are, and, as a proof, I can tell you that a namesake of yours has been dining with us, an old fellow-circuiter of yours. We have just finished dinner in the old Dissenting fashion. My father and mother will be very glad to see you.' Accordingly I went in, and sat with the Cogans a couple of hours. Mr. Cogan kept a school for many years, and was almost the only Dissenting schoolmaster whose competence as a Greek scholar was acknowledged by Dr. Parr."

November 6th, 1831. "Mr. Clarkson gave me to read a MS., drawn up for his daughter-in-law, containing a summary of religious doctrines from the lips of Jesus Christ. The chapter on future punishments peculiarly interested me; but I found that Mr. Clarkson had, contrary to his intention, written so as to imply his belief in the eternity of future punishments, which he does not believe."

He was anxious to alter this in his own hand, and with great difficulty made the necessary alteration in one place."

ON PREACHING.

GEORGE MULLER, of Ashley Down Orphanage celebrity, after many years' experience, thus expresses his ideas on the "Art of putting it;":

"It should be the aim of the teacher to speak so that children, servants, and people who cannot read may be able to understand him, so far as the natural mind can comprehend the things of God. It ought also to be remembered that there is, perhaps, not a single congregation in which there are not persons of the above class present, and if they can understand, the well-educated or literary persons will understand likewise; but the reverse does not hold good. It ought further to be remembered that the expounder of the truth of God speaks for God, for eternity, and that it is not in the least likely that he will benefit the hearer except he uses plainness of speech, which yet needs not to be vulgar or rude."

The present writer, as an attentive listener to sermons from Unitarian pulpits, would suggest to ministers who feel that they do not succeed as preachers, that they should make it their aim to keep the habitually sleepiest member of their flock in a state of wakefulness—use him as a gauge or indicator, for if he is made to receive instruction all the rest may be trusted to have benefited to a greater extent. But how to do this? Study the great "Art of putting it," as George Müller says. Each congregation contains a few people capable, by education or natural gift, of thinking, of following argument, of understanding abstract expressions, but many more are incapable of this. To them the time occupied by the sermon is one of weariness and vacuity. Let the preacher, then, translate his sermon before he preaches it, or as he preaches it, into the language of the common people, in order that they may hear him gladly. An educated man will naturally clothe his thoughts in the language of literature as he writes, and the Unitarian pulpit weekly resounds with compositions which would take high rank as literary productions, but fail as sermons, because this is a language incapable of effective delivery, and abounding in words of abstract meaning, and forms of expressions unknown in common talk. Let the earnest minister, who, perhaps, begins to begrudge the mental strain involved in composing sermon after sermon, to be delivered to a congregation of 100, of whom he knows, from long experience, that not 25 really listen—I say, let him take his old sermons, translate them into words of one syllable, or at any rate, ruthlessly expunge all words of more than two; if to this work he will throw in abundance of illustration, where the thought is not as clear as daylight, he may save himself further composition until his old stock is exhausted, and he will find the old sermon capable of delivery in a tone, and with expression which will rivet the attention of all, if there is anything in it. Some point to Mr. Spurgeon's eccentricities as the secret of his success—but this is not all, nor the chief element of his success—his printed sermons sell by the thousand weekly, without any aid from his expressive voice, or his dramatic action in illustrative passages, and the secret is his plainness of speech and directness of statement. Depend upon it, that the "Art of putting it" is, shall we say the first, requisite in a preacher. At any rate, it is a sine qua non. K.

DR. BELLOWS ON SECTARIANISM.

THE Monthly Journal of the American Unitarian Association for July furnishes us with very full and interesting reports of their recent anniversary meetings, of which we gave some account at the time. Our readers will be glad to see a fuller account of the address of Dr. Bellows. He said:

"We are here to consider, mainly, I suppose, our duties and our interests as Unitarian Christians. We are Christians, thank God! and as Christians, united with the whole Christian world; and, I trust, from the depths of our hearts, interested and moved in every fibre of our being by all the progress, by all the faithful labours, by all the successes, of all those who, under whatever forms of imperfect statement, of imperfect and undeveloped history, are yet doing their utmost to promote the glory of God and the triumphs of the gospel of Jesus Christ. But, if we sympathised in every respect with these great Christian bodies around us, why should we have Unitarian Christians at all? Why should we organise for any work as Unitarians? It is because we have been compelled by experience, spiritual progress, as we hope and believe, to abandon many things thought true by others, to oppose many other things which we think to be erroneous, false, and injurious. It is for that reason that we are here specially as Unitarian Christians; because, if we are to be Christians at all, we can be nothing but Unitarian Christians; and if we are to make Christians at all, the only kind of specifically Christian work that we can do better than anybody else, that we alone can do, and which we may safely confine ourselves to doing, because the Christian world at large is doing its own work in its own way better than we can do, is to make Unitarian Christians. And that, as it seems to me, is the whole of our Christian duty. Our Christian duty is to make Unitarian Christians, because it is the only kind of Christianity that we know anything about, fully believe in, and think to be the highest type, the only type that we can give our hearts to, wholly, completely, and unreservedly.

"I am not one of those advanced persons who feel themselves to be superior to all denominational and party considerations. I believe that Almighty God himself is not disregarding of denominational and party associations. I believe He has laid the foundations of their necessity in the laws of human nature, in the conditions of human society; and that He chooses to advance His work, and His Son's work in the world, by means of these party, denominational, ay, and sectarian organisations. For, if you come to look at the meaning of the word 'sectarianism,' or at the thing sectarianism, is it a thing of which you are to be ashamed? You cut off a piece of land, and devote yourself to tilling that land, in order to economise your powers, and bring something useful out of your agricultural labours. If God chose to cut you off, and confine and limit you, in your views and in the sphere of your religious labours, to a specific, definite work, that work is sectarian work; and are you to fling it back into His face, as though you despised the special duty to which He has called you, or are you to cheapen this work? Is sectarianism, in its highest and best sense, opposed, in any manner whatever, to Christian, enlarged, and noble sympathies? Do you consider that your party politics are opposed to patriotism? Are you the less an earnest, zealous, and determined Republican, because you mean to be a true and noble patriot? Not so. Nor ought you to feel, nor ought anybody to feel, that, with a stern, determined, resolute, enthusiastic devotion to that particular department of the Church in which God chooses to set him, he is any the less serving the church universal. I believe I serve the church universal best when I serve the Unitarian cause best, when I serve liberal Christianity best. If we cannot make better Christians; if we cannot make nobler and larger men and women; if we cannot do God's work better than other people; if our truth is not more true; if our spirit is not more the real spirit of the gospel of Jesus Christ; if we have not got something better than other Christians, let us give it up, and go and follow those who have got something better.

"Now anybody is at liberty to charge all this to any amount of self-complacency, and self-deception, and selfish appropriation of sound principles to one's own denomination. You may do just what you please about that. These are my simple, sincere, earnest convictions. I feel them, and I want you to feel them, because I believe your duty and your usefulness as Unitarian Christians depends upon your believing them and acting upon them. We all recognise the generosity and devotion with which people would act upon their convictions if they believed that the safety and eternal bliss of human souls depended upon their communicating to them the special type of doctrine, or belief, or view of Christianity, which has been allotted to them as Baptists, Episcopalians, Roman Catholics, or what not. I do believe, from the bottom of my soul, that the eternal welfare, the eternal blessedness of human beings, depends—I do not say how far, I do not say wholly, I do not say finally, but that their eternal well-being, their spiritual growth and development, their happiness on earth, their glory in heaven for unknown ages, may depend—upon their receiving enlightened, true, broad, generous, charitable, sound, Christ-like views and opinions of the religion that Jesus Christ taught in this world.

"Therefore I say that we have every motive, drawn from heaven and from earth, to labour in our day with all our minds and all our souls in the missionary work, in the Christian work, of building up specifically Unitarian institutions and Unitarian churches throughout this whole land; and I have no patience with those who have marked out a little area of country, or a little bit of New England, or a few great cities, or a little patch of geography here and there, and say, 'There, we can do this; it is our duty to attend to this little bit, to speak to these few hundreds of people here.' No, 'the whole boundless continent is ours,' and we are to make the people Unitarians just as fast as we can make them. We want all our ministers and all our people to go to work and aim at nothing less than converting the whole people of the United States. That is our aim. You need not smile, as if it were an absolute impossibility. I expect it; you expect it. If you did not expect it, sooner or later, you would give up this thing, and choose something else on which you could pledge your hopes more safely. If you do not think you have the truth, if you do not think the truth is going victoriously on, if you do not think God cares anything about it, or that Jesus Christ cares anything about it, or that saints and angels care anything about it, or that future generations will care anything about it, what is all this pother for? Let us abandon it, and go to work and do something which we believe in with all our hearts, and from which we expect great, noble, and magnificent results. I see nothing less than a wide-embracing missionary operation which includes all this country, nothing less than a missionary enterprise which keeps the whole globe, and our own age, and future ages, in view. We may, in the providence of God, pass on to something better than this. I do not suppose that we have exhausted all the truth in the New Testament, or know all the wisdom which is in Jesus Christ, much less all that is embodied in God. But I do not see anything better; if I did, I would go right off to it; but I say, what we do see, what we do believe in, it is our duty immediately to take hold of with our whole heart, and soul, and body, and advance by every means with which God will supply us.

"We want to believe in three things. We want to believe in God—a living God—a personal Spirit, the heavenly Father. We want to believe in Him with all our hearts and souls; and, in order to believe in that Spirit, we must believe in this spirit that lives in our own souls. I know, I love, I think; and there is something infinite that knows, and loves, and thinks above and beyond me. I believe in a living God, a personal God; and when I give up that faith, I expect my faith in everything else will soon follow it. We must believe in God—a living and a personal God. We must believe in Jesus Christ, our Saviour. I am not going to introduce here questions which are in dispute in our own body. This is not the time or the place. I only wish to express with all my heart and soul my profound conviction, my intense feeling, that the Church has crystallised itself about the person of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, and that if we are to be practical people, if we are to hope to carry this Christianity with us through the world, we cannot do it except under the leadership of that great captain. But we want humanity also. If I did not believe in humanity as the image of God, if I did not believe there was something holy, sublime, awful, greater than I can fathom, nobler, even, than I can conceive of in the dignity of that human nature which Channing, with his almost angelic voice, first taught us, better than any human lips have ever taught us, the dignity of,—if I did not believe in that, I should say, what is the use of all this work, and what is the hope of its success? Work depends as much on the goodness of the material with which you work, as on the design or the tools which you work with upon it, and therefore if human nature is not worth working upon, if it is not a glorious and noble thing to work for, your labour will surely be in vain.

"Finally, we need one thing almost as important as is our belief in God, our belief in Jesus Christ, and our belief in human nature, and that is to believe in ourselves. We want to believe in ourselves as Unitarian Christians, to believe in our mission, believe in our power, believe in that providence of God which has called us to fulfil a special mission and do a great work. If we do not believe in ourselves the world will not believe in us, the Orthodox will not believe in us, Jesus Christ will not believe in us, Almighty God will not believe in us, and the work will be taken out of our hands, and given to some people who have the courage, the honesty, and the logic, to believe in themselves. If Almighty God would raise up a few hundred Unitarian ministers who believed in themselves and in their work, in their mission and in their cause, my conviction is that, as in the case of the anti-slavery cause, which within my recollection was represented in this city by a few dozen persons whom we scornfully called 'Bobolitionists,' and who after 30 years have carried the whole country with them—I believe that a parallel success in an equally short period might be accomplished by the conversion of the whole rational, inquiring, and thoughtful people of these United States to that dear and precious faith which we call Unitarian Christianity."

As a sequel to this, perhaps as a needful balancing of it, though we hardly think Dr. Bellows's remarks could be understood as implying an approach of personal self-assertion or self-confidence, we cannot resist the temptation to give the fine comment of the Rev. J. F. W. Ware, in the closing speech of the evening:

"I feel, as we are about to part to-night, that we certainly have had an array of facts before us which we can take away with us, and can ponder, and can make the basis of future action. I believe that we have just begun to see over into the land of promise; I believe that we have been so far clearing the decks preparatory to action. And I believe that the time is come for us, each and all, in our places and according to our ability, to work in this work for God and His Christ. I am not, however, quite satisfied with what my good friend Dr. Bellows said with regard to what is necessary in this work; I do not exactly understand what it is to have faith in myself. Would to God that I had it! But I do feel this: that if one has faith in the God above him, if he has faith in the truth as it came into the world through Jesus Christ, if he has faith in that living example of every excellence which has come to us as the life of that Christ, not only mountains may be removed, but all difficulties that stand in the way in the human heart and the human brain. I think that what we need in going back to our separate spheres of work, is not so much confidence in ourselves as confidence in the words we have to speak, confidence in the work we have to do. I believe that if we have faith in God and faith in the work that we are to do for God, if we have faith in the words that Jesus spake, and faith in the life of Jesus, though we may not ourselves see the day when the truth that we accept shall have free course and be glorified, yet we shall die feeling that we have been pioneers in a great cause, and that the great army of the conquerors shall follow on in our steps. Friends, I feel that the hour is late. We are about to disperse. The end of this year's anniversary has come. Let us go home, thank God, take courage, and go to work."

And then at the conclusion of Mr. Ware's remarks, the meeting was closed with the singing of the hymn,—

"God is my strong salvation;
What foe have I to fear?"

FIRESIDE READINGS.

THE INCENSE OF FLOWERS.

BY ROBERT LEIGHTON.

THE rich abundance of the rose, its breath
On which I almost think my soul could live,
This sweet ambrosia which e'en in death
Its leaves hold on to give,—

Whence is it? From dank earth or scentless air?
Or from the inner sanctuaries of heaven?
We probe the branch, the root—no incense there,
O God, whence is it given?

Is it the essence of the morning dew,
Or distillation of a purer sphere—
The breath of the immortals coming through
To us immortals here?

Exquisite mystery; my heart devours
The living inspiration, and I know
Sweet revelations with the breath of flowers
Into our beings flow.

WOMEN IN THE CHURCH.

MR. LECKY, in his History of Morals, considers that the general superiority of women to men in the strength of their religious emotions, and their natural attraction to a religion which made personal attachment to its Founder its central duty, and which imparted an unprecedented dignity and afforded an unprecedented scope to their characteristic virtues, account for the very conspicuous position which they assumed in the great work of the conversion of the Roman Empire.

In no other important movement of thought was female influence so powerful or so acknowledged. In the ages of persecution female figures occupy many of the foremost places in the ranks of martyrdom, and Pagan and Christian writers alike attest the alacrity with which women flocked to the church, and the influence they exercised in its favour over the male members of their families. The mothers of St. Augustine, St. Chrysostom, St. Basil, St. Gregory Nazianzen, and St. Theodore, had all a leading part in the conversion of their sons. St. Helena, the mother of Constantine; Flaccilla, the wife of Theodosius the Great; St. Pulcheria, the sister of Theodosius the Younger, and Placidia, the mother of Valentinian III., were among the most conspicuous defenders of the faith.

In the heretical sects, the same zeal was manifested, and Arius, Priscillian, and Montanus, were all supported by troops of zealous female devotees. In the cause of asceticism women took a part little, if at all, inferior to men, while in the organisation of the great work of charity they were pre-eminent. For no other field of active labour are women so admirably suited as for this; and although we may trace from the earliest period, in many creeds and ages, individual instances of their influence in allaying the sufferings of the distressed, it may be truly said that their instinct and genius of charity had never before the dawn of Christianity obtained full scope for action. Fabiola, Paula, Melama, and a host of other noble ladies, devoted their time and fortunes mainly to founding and extending vast institutions of charity, some of them of a kind before unknown in the world. The Empress Flaccilla was accustomed to tend, with her own hands, the sick in the hospitals, and a readiness to discharge such offices was deemed the first duty of a Christian wife.

From age to age the impulse thus communicated has been felt. There has been no period, however corrupt; there has been no church, however superstitious, that has not been adorned by many Christian women devoting their entire lives to assuaging the sufferings of men, and the mission of charity thus instituted has not been more efficacious in diminishing the sum of human wretchedness than in promoting the moral dignity of those by whom it was conducted. . . . Independently of all legal enactments, the simple change of the ideal type, by bringing specially feminine virtues into the forefront, was sufficient to elevate and ennoble the sex. The commanding position of the mediæval abbesses, the great number of female saints, especially the reverence bestowed upon the Virgin, had a similar effect. . . . Whatever may be thought of its theological propriety, there is little doubt that the Catholic reverence for the Virgin has done much to elevate and purify the ideal of women, and to soften the manners of men. . . . It supplied, in a great measure, the redeeming and ennobling element in that strange amalgam of religious, licentious, and military feeling which was formed around women in the age of chivalry, and which no succeeding change of habit or belief has wholly destroyed.

THE POWER OF A WORD.

WENDELL PHILLIPS, in one of his speeches, gives the following striking illustration of the influence which may be exerted by a few words spoken with the earnestness of love:

A mother on the green hills of Vermont was holding by the right hand a son, 16 years old, mad with love of the sea. And as he stood by the garden gate one morning, she said, "Edward, they tell me—for I never saw the ocean—that the great temptation of a seaman's life is drink. Promise me, before you quit your mother's hand, that you will never drink." "And," said he (for he told me the story), "I gave the promise, and I went the globe over; Calcutta and the Mediterranean, San Francisco and Cape of Good Hope, the North Pole and the South. I saw them all in forty years, and I never saw a glass filled with sparkling liquor that my mother's form by the gate did not rise before me, and to-day I am innocent of the taste of liquor."

Was not that sweet evidence of the power of a single word? Yet that is not half. "For," said he, "yesterday there came into my counting-room, a man of forty years.

"Do you know me?"

"No!"

"Well," said he, "I was once brought drunk into your presence on shipboard; you were a passenger; they kicked me aside; you took me to your berth and kept me there till I had slept off the intoxication; you then asked if I had a mother. I said I had never known a word from her lips. You told me of yours at the garden gate; and to-day I am master of one of the packets in New York; and I came to ask you to come and see me."

How far that little candle throws its beams! That mother's word in the green hills of Vermont! Oh! God be thanked for the mighty power of a single word.

JOHN CHINAMAN IN CALIFORNIA.

MR. C. L. BRACE, in a work recently published, entitled "The New West," gives the following description of the Chinese character, which he appears to have carefully studied, as it appears in San Francisco. He says:—I am often surprised at the faces and expressions one encounters among them; such, if you saw them in European dress, you would have said were the faces certainly of scholars and gentlemen—countenances frequently of marked refinement, and eyes of deep, thoughtful, almost sad expression. It is a strange contrast, the powerful, intense, pushing sons of the Pilgrims, and this meek, quiet, dreamy Pagan of the Orient, meeting on the shores of the Pacific. The latter bends like the rush before our iron race; he abandons the immemorial customs of ages, and falls, to a degree, into the current of Anglo-American civilisation. One old sea captain who had been much in the East, said he had seen many countries where the Chinese were living as strangers, but this was the only one where John Chinaman hides his pigtail. He dresses frequently like an American. He begins occasionally to eat beef, and has already learned something of Yankee sharpness. In general, however, he is still a stranger—the very incarnation of meekness and submission beneath the strong race which he is serving. There is one habit in man which always seemed to me to bring him nearest to the brute creation—the disposition to attack or oppress a fellow-creature who is disabled by nature or is too weak to resist; that tendency which makes horses kick the lame one, or fowls attack the dying one of the flock. The Chinaman has been the luckless object of this brutal instinct in California. He has incarnated, amid a Christian community, the inspired doctrine of "Resist not evil!" "Turn ye the other cheek!" and the result has been that every man's hand has been against him. The whites have cheated, robbed, beaten him, and he has returned it with all docility and faithful service. When struck, he struck not again! when robbed, he complained not; when murdered, there was often no redress. The most miserable drunken white ruffian could beat him, or strip him of his hard earnings, or kill him, and if there was no white witness justice could not overtake the offender. While all other men—even the lowest vagabonds—were gladly admitted to the mines, he alone was, and is now, excluded; and even on the placer-diggings, he alone must pay his tax of $4 before being permitted to work. Even the Digger Indians, seeing this universal oppression, ventured also to plunder and persecute this unresisting stranger.

At length the aspect of this Christian patience in a Pagan—this meekness, which bore all without a murmur—of this enduring, industrious, respectful stranger, who did his work faithfully, and returned not evil for evil, began to touch the generosity of Californians. The Chinaman, even against the prejudices of race, and the competition of ignorant labour, began to win his way to public respect. White men sometimes took his part against white ruffians. Employers found him too useful to permit him to be driven off by "anti-coolie" vagabonds. The conscience of the people arose against this oppression. Public opinion more and more sheltered him, and set the pursuit of justice after those who wronged him. White men have even been hung in these later years for murdering Chinese. Their labour, too, became more and more indispensable for the country. A hundred different branches soon depended on it. Without it, it was evident that manufactures and a large part of Californian agriculture and horticulture would cease to exist; railroads could not be constructed, and a vast deal of business must be contracted or given up. The result, both of conscience and of interest, in California, has been a great change of opinion and action toward the Chinese. People everywhere speak well of them, and agree that they are the most industrious and steady of labourers, not as efficient, perhaps, as the Irish, but more regular and sober, and with a great talent at imitation. In person they are the neatest of creatures. I have seen a whole gang, after a day's work on a farm, washing themselves all over with warm water, which they keep ready for their return, as carefully as a company of gentlemen, and I was assured this is their daily habit. The common labourers are said to keep a horn instrument for cleaning their tongues every morning! They are always neatly and nicely dressed, and are far more agreeable coach-company than the Mexicans or Spaniards here, who are exceedingly "odorous."

THE DIVINE LIFE.

Oh! sacred union with the Perfect Mind!
Transcendent bliss which Thou alone canst give!
How blest are they this pearl of price who find,
And, dead to earth, have learned in Thee to live.
Thus in thine arms of love, oh God, I lie,
Lost and for ever lost to all but Thee;
My happy soul, since it hath learned to die,
Hath found new life in Thine Infinity.
Oh! go and learn this lesson of the Cross;
And tread the way which saints and prophets trod,
Who, counting life and self and all things loss,
Have found in inward death the life of God.
T. C. UPHAM.

INTELLIGENCE.

CHICHESTER.—The children in the Sunday-school had their annual excursion to Goodwood, on Wednesday, the 11th instant, accompanied as usual by some of the parents and members of the congregation.

CWMBACH.—On Thursday, the 5th instant, the Sunday-school children connected with the Abernathygroesucha Unitarian Chapel, had their annual treat together with a few of the members and others to the number of 120. After tea, they adjourned to a field kindly put at their disposal by Daniel David, Esq. In the evening, a concert was held in the schoolroom. At the close, we learn, and we hope our readers will be the wiser for the information, that the whole company joined in singing "Hen Wlad Fy Nhadau."

LONDON.—On Thursday, 12th instant, the Rev. N. Green held an open-air service, which was well attended. At the conclusion a large number of tracts bearing on Unitarian Christianity were again distributed. The attention which the people manifest at these out-of-door gatherings is very encouraging.

MANCHESTER: TESTIMONIAL TO MR. JOHN ARMSTRONG.—It will be seen by our advertising columns that this matter is now closed, and we are glad to say that the sum of £220 has been handed to Mr. Armstrong, along with an illuminated album, executed by Messrs. Howell, James, and Co., of London, and containing a list of the contributors. The presentation was made privately through Dr. Beard, "as a token of friendship and esteem, and in recognition of his numerous acts of self-denying kindness and long and disinterested services in connection with the Home Missionary Board, and other social and religious institutions of the Unitarian denomination," and the following letter in reply has been received from Mr. Armstrong:

Manchester, August 10th, 1869.

Dear Friends,—I cannot sufficiently express my thanks for the handsome testimonial which I have just received. It is very gratifying to know that all the subscriptions have been given without personal solicitation. Fifty-six years ago I became convinced that Unitarianism was the doctrine of the gospel. My faith on this has never wavered, nor has my zeal waxed cold. In a quiet and private way I have conversed on the subject with friends. I have lent and distributed a great number of books and tracts. I have always taken a great interest in the progress and operations of the Unitarian Home Missionary Board, believing that we need a class of ministers whose pulpit services and pastoral visits would be most suitable for small rural congregations and missionary stations. I rejoice that the institution has proved a great success, more than fifty students being now settled as ministers in different parts of the United Kingdom. I am now in my 80th year; my work is done, but, while a little energy and strength are vouchsafed to me, I shall do all I can to promote the prosperity of the Board, and to proclaim the doctrines of our holy faith.—I am, dear friends, yours much obliged, (Signed) JNO. ARMSTRONG.

To the Committee and Subscribers to the Testimonial Fund.

SALFORD: FORD-STREET.—On Monday evening last the annual meeting of this congregation was held in the schoolroom. Mr. Seddon presided, and from the report read it appeared that the offertory system had placed the finances in a much more satisfactory state than they had previously been. It was determined that an effort should be made to build a chapel for the congregation in the neighbourhood of Pendleton.

STOURBRIDGE.—The annual sermon in aid of the funds of the Wollaston-road Schools was preached in the Presbyterian Chapel, on Sunday afternoon, August 8th, by the Rev. J. Drummond. The collection amounted to £40. 5s. 1d. On the same evening the members of the choir were, according to custom, entertained at a substantial tea. After tea, on the motion of the Rev. D. Maginnis (who presided), seconded by Mr. J. Millward, schools treasurer, a cordial vote of thanks was passed to the Rev. J. Drummond for his services that afternoon. Thanks were also voted to the organist and choir for the intelligent and highly satisfactory way in which they had conducted the psalmody that day and throughout the past year. The remainder of the evening was devoted to music. On the following Monday, the schools children had their annual treat in a suitable field near the town. The number of school children on the field was 218, and of friends nearly 200, including Rev. J. Drummond, Manchester; Rev. A. W. Worthington, Mansfield; and Rev. Geo. Knight, late minister of the Baptist Congregation, Stourbridge.

SUSSEX: NORTHAM (From a London correspondent).—I attended our little chapel on Sunday last in this quiet agricultural village of about 1,000 inhabitants, and was delighted to find at the afternoon service every seat in the chapel—about 160—filled by a most attentive congregation. The choir of 40 singers occupies the gallery, with flutes, bassoon, &c.; and a heartier worship I have not joined in for many years. It is very remarkable, as this chapel had been closed for 12 years, and our cause was thought quite died out, that so many people in a few months should have been gathered in for worship. The squire of the village offered to buy the chapel a few years ago, but one family staunch to the cause said—No, the day might come when Unitarian worship would be held and prosper there; and they have lived to see this day. The preacher, the Rev. James Bayley, engaged by the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, is a quiet and valuable man, who speaks to the people of the spirit of a true Christian life amid their duties and trials, and now and then exhibits to them the doctrines of Unitarian Christianity; and the people, I am told, very much value the preaching. If any other chapels in other parts have been closed, this success may form a very good precedent for an attempt at a re-opening.

WHAT THE CHURCHES ARE DOING.

The administrators of Heber C. Kimbal's estate, Brigham Young's first counsellor, have made a return from which it appears that he leaves forty-one children—thirty sons and eleven daughters—and property to the value of 59,000 dollars.

From statements recently published, Christianity appears to have made considerable progress in Turkey during the last twelve years. In connection with the five divisions of the missions under the American Board—the Western, Central, Eastern, and the Syrian and Nestorian—there were last year 96 male and female missionaries in 22 of the principal cities of Asia Minor and of Bulgaria in European Turkey, 18 in Syria, and 14 among the Nestorians. The number of native agents was 440. There were 63 organised churches, besides the Syrian and Nestorian, and 3,585 church members, and 38 native pastors, exclusive of those among the Nestorians. The number of enrolled Armenian Protestants in Turkey was 15,500, and there were many besides who had not yet had the courage to declare themselves. Of the 63 native Armenian churches 21 were self-supporting, and no church paid less than one-fourth of its pastor's salary. More than half the expense of missionary operations in Central and Eastern Turkey, exclusive of the salaries of missionaries, was borne last year by the native Protestants.

The Swiss Federal Council, alleging its incompetency, has declined to take any part in the forthcoming Ecumenical. And while declaring its full agreement with the principles laid down in Prince Hohenloe's circular note, proposing a collective protest against any measures that may be devised affecting the authority of the State, it sees no necessity for anticipating these, and rests with confidence on the power of the Bund to deal with any decrees which the Papal Council may pass.

The Kirchentag, or Convocation, at Stuttgart, has adopted by acclamation a reply to the Pope's manifesto to Protestants and non-Catholics. The German divines decline altogether to recognise any right in the Pope to call them together, or of any ecclesiastical assembly to exercise authority over them. And they record their resolve to "defend and preserve the great inheritance of the Reformation for the salvation of themselves and of their children, and as a security to mankind, Roman Catholic as well as Protestant, that the Bible shall never again be buried under the proud towers of lofty cathedrals."

The Church News says that the Bishop of Ripon has just refused to ordain men to curacies if they will not deny the doctrine of the Real Presence, though he is well aware that the incumbents by whom they were presented believe that doctrine, and will not have curates who do not hold it.

By the death of the Rev. W. G. Townley, the richest rectory in England, that of St. Peter's, Upwell, Wisbech, has become vacant. It is returned in the Clergy List as worth £3,058 a year, but is well known to be worth considerably more. Mr. Townley succeeded his father in 1862. In the same parish there is another rectory, that of Christ Church, returned as worth £1,594 a year, which is likewise in the gift of the Townley family. These are cases deserving the consideration of the Spectator. To us they seem hardly to support its view of the present mode of clerical appointments.

According to the Record, a portion of the "Speaker's Commentary," which people had begun to think must have been abandoned, is now in type.

On which the Times thus comments: "We question whether a more monstrous abuse was ever seen than this. The country has just been outraged by stories of the wicked wealth of the Irish Church, and yet the ecclesiastical endowments of the sister country did not after all amount to quite a pound per head of the Protestant population. But allowing these 162 attendants to represent a Church population of 500, we have here a dozen and more parishes, fourteen times more opulent than the Establishment which has just expired from a plethora of earthly goods. Our object in printing the list is not, however, to rail at the City, but to point out how admirably it reduces to an absurdity both the Protestant theory of worship, and that idol of high and dry Anglicanism, the Parochial system."

A Miss Smiley, of Baltimore, was allowed to preach a short time ago in the Free Churches at Harray and Sanday. At a meeting of the Orkney Free Church Presbytery the other day, attention was called to this fact, and Mr. Roy moved a resolution declaring female preaching to be inconsistent with the practice of the Church and opposed to Scripture, and enjoining the brethren within the bounds of the Presbytery to discourage such preaching by refusing the use of their churches for it. The two ministers who had allowed Miss Smiley to preach—Mr. White and Mr. Armour—defended themselves vigorously, and there was a long discussion. Mr. White moved the previous question; but on a division Mr. Roy's motion was carried by seven votes to two.

Though the subscription for the erection, at Leicester, of a colossal statue of Robert Hall, the great Baptist preacher, does not increase very rapidly, it is making progress, and nearly £500 has now been obtained.

It is said that Dr. Henry Newman is preparing a work upon Rationalism, and that the first part of it may be shortly expected.

The Bishop of Exeter, of whom it has often been reported that he wished he might not die while the Liberals were in power, has written to the Archbishop of Canterbury, signifying his intention of forthwith resigning the see which he has held so long, and the duties of which he has for some time been so little able to discharge. If Dr. Wilberforce be translated to Winchester, Mr. Gladstone will have three bishoprics to dispose of next month, besides that of Bath and Wells now vacant, while the illness of the Bishop of Carlisle may lead to another vacancy perhaps by resignation.

It will be remembered that not long since Sir Moses Montefiore benevolently went to Moldavia to use his influence there on behalf of his persecuted co-religionists. It seems likely that his interposition will soon be needed again. The Roumanian Prime Minister has addressed a letter to the prefect of Belgrade, in which he recommends that the Moldavian Jews should be transported in a body to a sort of Botany Bay on the shores of the Black Sea. After describing these Jews as "vagrants" and "a real pestilence," "inconveniencing the Government and demoralising the population," the Minister instructs the prefect to inspect the territory at the mouth of the Black Sea for the purpose of ascertaining whether it can be converted into a settlement for them. In the last Roumanian official census it was stated that there are 5,000 of these "Jewish vagrants" in the country.

An address of sympathy with the Church of Ireland in the "severe trial" through which it is now passing, is in the course of signature in England and Wales. The clergy and laymen who sign it, desire to record their belief that, though the Church of Ireland is no longer recognised by the State as a part of the national establishment, they and that Church are still one, and it is their earnest desire that they may be more closely united in advancing that pure and undefiled religion in the faith of which they have been so long bound together.

The first step towards the reconstruction of the Irish Church was taken on Tuesday, when the united synods of Armagh and Dublin met in St. Patrick's Cathedral. The bishops of Ossory, Cork, Killaloe, Limerick, and Cashel were present; and the proctors of the caputular bodies and of the clergy, as well as the deans and archdeacons, attended from all the dioceses. The Dean of St. Patrick's (Dr. West) was appointed prolocutor or chairman. A message was sent down from the Upper House for the consideration of the Lower, protesting against the recent legislative measures affecting the Irish branch of the United Church of England and Ireland in these words, "That this Synod cannot commence its deliberations without recording before God and man its solemn protest against the measure whereby the Imperial Legislature has both deprived the Church of Ireland of its prescriptive right, and confiscated the endowments which the piety of our ancestors had devoted to the service of God. This Synod accordingly protests against that act of the Legislature whereby, to the great detriment of the Commonwealth, the national profession of the religion of Christ has been repudiated in Ireland, and the connection between the National Church and the State has been dissolved." This protest was adopted by the Lower House, though it is understood that the Bishop of Down objected to it.

WHAT IS SAYING ON CHURCH MATTERS.

Dr. Cumming, in opposition to the Editor of the Westminster Gazette, who, he thinks, "deserves a medal from the Pope for his obstinate resistance to facts, and sublime contempt of all private judgment whatever," still contends that "Protestants are admissible, under certain considerations, to an Ecumenical Council." In support of this view, he repeats the "Injunctions" (quoted by Archbishop Manning in his "England and Christendom"), by which the Pope notified to the Legates what he would have to be observed before the Protestants were admitted to be heard; says that "The Protestant Powers were invited to attend the Council of Trent in 1560, on its third convocation;" that Hardwin states, "a citation was issued by the Pope to the Bohemian heretics to appear before the Lateran Council;" and that "Huss and Jerome were invited to the Council of Constance;" and thinks that "the approaching Council at Rome may well follow, and need not be ashamed of such precedents." He adds, in conclusion, "I repeat I am ready to 'avail myself of the opportunity of the General Council,' as required and invited by Pius IX., as soon as the Pontiff is pleased to inform me, in answer to my respectful letter, that I shall be heard in reply to his earnest entreaty to renounce the Protestant faith, and return to the Roman Church."

A correspondence has been going on between Dr. McNeile and the secretary of the Church Congress to be held in Liverpool next month which has ended in the Evangelical Dean withdrawing from the Congress, inasmuch as the committee determine to retain the name of the Rev. Mr. Mackonochie to appear in the official list as a speaker on the subject of the offertory. In one of his letters the dean thus gives his reason for the course he has taken:—"If a gentleman who has been condemned by the highest tribunal in the country is to be publicly received and recognised as if no such condemnation had taken place, there seems to be no limit and no distinction made between the observers and the transgressors of our ecclesiastical law. This is not a matter of private judgment or narrow bigotry; it is a matter of public justice, and of the separation of our English Church, in all her legitimate breadth, from lawlessness." We should have thought the dean would have been glad of the occasion to put his erring brother right.

At a harvest thanksgiving service at Bristol, Archdeacon Denison gave but a gloomy picture of the present condition of the English Church. He said:

"It was in a great strait—it would be madness to conceal it—and God warned them of the strait they were in; they were beset on every side. On one side there was the Roman Catholic; on the other there was the Nonconformist; on the third side there was the man whose whole religion was linked up in what he conceived to be the will of the civil power; and on the fourth side were those who were of no particular religion, and cared for none. All those were besetting the Church of England." It was a mistake, he told his hearers, to suppose, as enemies sometimes said, that the priests were getting an undue influence over the hearts of the people. They were not above them, but their servants. And he added, a wish in which we heartily join, "might they never abuse those who differed from them, but seek to win souls."

The Archdeacon has a characteristic note in the Telegraph about Church Congresses. "The Church of England is very sick, suffering from more than one kind of obstinate sickness. Some years it was thought that yearly Church Congresses might be a medicine helping towards a cure. I have taken part in all of them, and for some years I have thought that whatever other effects they might have, they might do something towards producing a little charity." He perceives, however, that this is a delusion. The Dean of Ripon has made a "monstrous demand" on the Congress. The position of the Congress on the other hand is "pitiable." On the whole the Archdeacon has lost all his illusions about Congresses. He would like them to die in peace, and he feels that if they did the amount of humbug in the Church would be perceptibly diminished.

The Pall Mall, describing the disease under which the Church of England labours, says:

"The most distressing of its symptoms are three in number. The first is to be found in the vigour of its antagonists; never were the Roman Catholics on the one hand, or the Protestant Dissenters on the other, so vivacious, or secessions in each direction so numerous. The second consists in its internal divisions, and in their incurable or hardly curable character. When Mr. Voysey and Mr. Liddon are both members of the same religious body, and when neither can silence the other, internal harmony is hopeless, and the claim of the Church to preach any one set of doctrines is obviously absurd. The law of the land, and nothing else, is the bond which keeps together the Church of England, in so far as it is kept together. The third symptom is the increasing disposition of the age to embrace the voluntary system, and to have free trade in religion as well as in other things. These three symptoms are serious enough in all conscience, and collectively constitute about as serious a disease as any Church could wish to labour under."

It is strange to see in what a totally different light the same thing can present itself to different persons. By most who have considered it, the Irish Church has been generally regarded as a source of bitterness and contention; but in a speech at a meeting of the Carlisle branch of the Church Association, Dean Close described it as "one of the most glorious emblems of harmony and love," and declared his belief that "a great national sin had been committed in casting it away and tearing it off from the British crown and the British empire." In the same speech, the dean reviewed the proceedings of the English Church Union, and argued from these that there is a deep design to insinuate Popery into the Church of England. He likewise attributed not a little of the Bishop of Carlisle's illness and suffering to the troubles which High-Churchmen had given him in his diocese.

The Star, after an estimate of the Bishop of Exeter, says:

"Dean Close is a dignitary of the opposite school, and accordingly he proves himself conspicuously wanting in the qualities for which in politics High Church ecclesiastics are often distinguished. When he presents himself, he seems surrounded, not by the aroma of tradition, statecraft, and affairs, but by the steam of tea and muffins, and the adulation of foolish women. He uses language which is not of this world, and which can only be appreciated within his own circle, where his exhortations are wholly unnecessary. He flourishes wildly about the necessity of defending an 'open Bible,' which no one can possibly shut, and the 'Protestant privileges of the land,' which every statesman knows to be perfectly unassailable. He is guilty of an extravagance which no High Churchman would be betrayed into, however anxious to defend the Irish Church, when he calls it 'one of the most glorious emblems of harmony and love.' In fact, no sooner does the Dean lift his voice than we all see what manner of man he is. In this tea-meeting style he might continue for hours, and produce nothing but disgust in the world where the battle he is concerned with will have to be fought."

The Church Times offers this recipe for the reconstruction of the Free Church in Ireland:

"As was to be expected from the attitude of the clergy when the Disestablishment Bill was merely a terror of the future, and not an accomplished fact, the money question is that which takes the lead, and arouses the chief interest. But we should much prefer seeing attention centred on theological matters and questions of discipline, and extirpating that ulcerous cancer of Protestantism which must be fatal, sooner or later, to any Church that does not use moral steel and fire upon it. The abolition of the Thirty-nine Articles, the adoption of Edward VI.'s First Communion Office, the drawing up of a short renunciation of all distinctively Lutheran, Calvinistic, and Zwinglian tenets, the deprivation of all Orange clergymen, and all accomplices in swindling missionary societies, would win for the Disestablished Church the respect of Christendom, and begin for her a career of spiritual prosperity such as has never yet visited her in dreams."

We last week gave a paragraph from the same paper, showing the kind of esteem in which Episcopacy is held by some Churchmen. The Hampshire Independent furnishes us with similar appreciation of it, in the report of a meeting of the English Church Union in that county. The Rev. J. Sprenger read a paper "On the Primitive and Catholic Mode of Electing Bishops," in which he showed that in primitive times there were no such things as State-made bishops, and pretty plainly intimated that to such as were now set over them the clergy owed no obedience. The Rev. J. G. Fincher observed there had been no canonical election of bishops in England since the time of William the Conqueror. They were now "foisted into dioceses, for which they were totally unfit, without any reference to their spiritual qualifications, without any regard to their love of souls or for Christ, but because of their political influence." The Rev. J. A. Plow said, "it had long been his impression that the chief pastors of their church did not believe in their office; and like bishops like priests."

The 18th ult. being the centenary of the birth of Napoleon the Great, the Jewish Chronicle is surprised that the thanksgiving service, which was held in all the synagogues of the French Empire in honour of the Emperor's fête, was not celebrated with greater ceremonial on that account. "Napoleon the First," it says, "was a great friend of the Jews, and the consistorial organisation of French Judaism is due to him. It was he who insisted on the destruction of the insulting placard on the Zeil, or public promenade of Frankfurt-on-the-Maine, 'Jews and dogs may not enter here.'"

In addressing his constituents on Monday evening, Mr. Watkin Williams, the member for the Denbighshire boroughs, excited great enthusiasm by his remarks concerning the Church in Wales. He said:

"The position of this was one of the most important topics for future consideration. At a late period of the Session which had just closed, he gave notice that he should, on the re-assembling of Parliament, call attention to the existing state of religious inequality in the Principality, and move the following resolutions: First, that the time had arrived when the measure of religious equality which had been granted to Ireland could no longer, consistently with justice, be withheld from Wales; and, secondly, that it was expedient that the surplus funds to be derived from the property of the disestablished and disendowed church should be applied towards the advancement of a national and purely undenominational system of education. That notice he did not hesitate to say was warmly received by the House. Mr. Gladstone was present, and heard it, and if his countenance expressed anything, he was gratified and pleased with it. It had been objected to as premature. He did not believe that it was so, nor did he agree with the supposition of some that it would bring about a reaction with regard to the Irish Church. The carrying of the Irish Church Bill was the earnest of still greater victories yet to be achieved. The Welsh people supported it in the belief that their turn would come next. The opportunity which they had now must be improved. If they did not earnestly and at once press forward their own case, they would run the risk of defeat."

In an address to the clergy of the rural deanery in which his park is situated, the Archbishop of Canterbury frankly acknowledged the dangers to which the Church is exposed. Superstition and infidelity, he said, seemed to be more actively at work than at any former period. He did not speak of England only, but of Europe. In our own country the danger of infidelity seems to be not so much from abstract speculations and questionings, though this danger is not to be overlooked, but of a grosser and far more threatening kind. The danger is that the masses of our population, knowing nothing and caring nothing about philosophical questions, may become practical infidels, sink into materialism, living only for the life which now is, and putting altogether out of their thoughts the world unseen. Referring to changes in the ministrations of the Church which appeared desirable, he touched first upon the Liturgy. Though adapted to the educated, it is hardly so to the poor, and does not seem to commend itself to the lower middle classes. He then mentioned some of the alterations which the Ritual Commission proposed in the rubrics. Matters of doctrine are not within its scope. The changes thought desirable, and which are at present under the consideration of the Divinity professors of the Universities, and other dignitaries of the Church, may be summed up as follow: 1. A new lectionary. Many chapters have been added, as suited to edification; some have been omitted. A greater elasticity has been given to the lectionary. The principal changes are in the daily lessons. 2. Alterations in the ordinary daily service. Evidently, to men busily engaged, the service as it stands at present does not commend itself. Even the city churches which have a daily service are but thinly attended. A shorter service, therefore, will be proposed—shorter, but strictly based upon the existing materials. 3. Every facility for dividing services, and using different services at different times, according to the exigencies of different congregations. 4. In the burial service some solution of a difficulty commonly felt will be offered. Nothing revolutionary need be anticipated. The character of the Prayer Book will be preserved intact. We doubt whether these changes will be anything like sufficient to commend it to the large class to whom he admits that it does not seem to be adapted.

Though the claims which the Irish Roman Catholic bishops make regarding education, and the tone in which they are expressed are, no doubt, extravagant and insulting, the Pall Mall thinks they ought not to surprise any one, for they are simply one more repetition of a claim which, from the very nature of their position, the Roman Catholic clergy make in all parts of the world where they can get a hearing, and which, in fact, they are compelled to make by the very nature of the case. The position of the Roman Catholic Church may be shortly described by saying that their clergy claim moral and religious sovereignty over the whole human race. This of course includes the existence of a corresponding obligation on the part of the rest of mankind, and in particular on the part of the lay Government, or the State, to recognize them in that capacity, and this again must undoubtedly be held to include a claim to the direction and superintendence of public education in so far as the State interferes with it at all. This point, therefore, which Cardinal Cullen's letter raises is simply whether the English people are or are not prepared to assent to this claim on the part of the Roman Catholic clergy. The answer to this demand which will be given is obvious enough. It is a claim to which the English people never will consent, unless their views and character should change beyond all calculation.

Under the heading "Cullen O'Simples" Punch has this:

"Cardinal Cullen orders three days of rejoicing over the Downfall of the Established Church in Ireland. Ungrateful Paul! That church, by virtue of the hatreds it fostered, was the best friend of his own. If the Disestablishment bring peace, and fraternisation, how long will superstition have a chance? To do him justice, Paul sees this, and drives the little Catholics out of Protestant society. But that will not do, while the parents can meet. Why doesn't he order that no Catholic shall speak to a Protestant? Probably, 'Cut the Frods' will be the next howl from the altar. Unless this be the command, and it be obeyed, Rome has seen her best days in Ireland. He had better revoke the order for thanksgiving, or transfer the thanks to the account of St. Bartholomew's day, or some other real Catholic victory."

The Post asks what nations are likely to send representatives to the Pope's Council. Will France send one? It is very doubtful, but certainly not specially, unless invitation is given; and if invitation be sent to France, how can Italy be omitted; and yet how, in the face of the present relation between her Sovereign and the Pope, can she be asked? Again, if France does not send a special diplomat, what country will? Probably neither Austria, nor Spain, nor in all likelihood in any event will Northern Germany be represented. The Eastern Church has ignored the whole thing, and up to the present time Dr. Cumming is the only representative who has tendered his presence. Should this be the position up to the 8th of December, the play will fall through and the attempted movement be a thorough fiasco. But supposing, on the other hand, that all the great Roman Countries send special representatives, what will then be the attitude of Rome, and what the position of the diplomats? Will the Court of Rome desire that they shall be merely passive representatives, and act simply in the capacity of seals which shall give authority and currency to the dogmas and canons which the Supreme Pontiff may think fit to determine upon and issue. It is hardly probable that in the present frame of the European mind, bent, as it is in some quarters, upon the separation of Church and State, and in all upon establishing and maintaining the subordination of the ecclesiastical to the civil power, such a proposition would be accepted. If, however, it should be conceded by Rome that the representation shall be real and active, the Papal system will be placed in a position as unprecedented in occurrence as it will be difficult of management and control. Neither horn of the dilemma will be pleasant; if the one offers repose it will be a dangerous repose, and upon the other it will be very awkward to be tossed.

OUR FRIENDS IN CANADA.

We have the following letter from a member of our Unitarian congregation at Toronto, and though it was not intended for publication, we are sure that our readers will be glad to see it; and if it helps to rouse a more kindly, brotherly sympathy among our English congregations towards our friends in Canada, it will have done great good:

"Toronto, Province of Ontario,

"25th August, 1869.

"Dear Sir,—You will probably recollect that in December, 1865, an attempt was made by an incendiary to destroy the Unitarian church of this city. The place where the wretch set the fire was the apartment in the basement used as a library and committee-room. Although the fire was extinguished before the church was entirely destroyed, the library was lost. Some few volumes only, apparently scorched, were rebound; but it was soon found that the paper was so crisped that it could not hold the bookbinders' stitches, and the volumes fell to pieces. The loss of our library was almost total, and with it we lost our Sunday-school apparatus, of maps, bibles, testaments, teachers' manuals, melodeon, &c. Since this disaster we have been from time to time adding to our library, although only by small instalments, and have now a small fund to be used for the same purpose. The books obtainable in Canada are almost all orthodox (generally Calvinistic) in sentiment, and the heavy taxation on all materials used in book-making in the United States enhances prices there very much; besides, we find in some American Sunday-school library catalogues books, which from their political bias, we would not feel inclined to put on our Sunday-school bookshelves. This subject was discussed at our last teachers' meeting, and I was requested to write to some Unitarian gentleman in England and inquire of him if there be any book establishment in your country under the management of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, or any other organisation from which a supply of books for our Sunday-school library could be purchased. If you could favour me, by mail, with the catalogues of any such establishments, you would confer a kindness on your co-religionists here.

"It will naturally occur to you, on reading this letter, how comes it that our Christian brethren in one of the most extensive and valuable appendages in Great Britain are so little acquainted with matters denominational in England, or so little cared for? The answer is brief. You have left us out in the cold. For the United States, the nursing mother of Fenianism, you are overflowing with sympathy and compliment; with Hungary you are hand and glove (at which I am rejoiced); but with those in Canada, who are bone of your bone, of the same stock, and the same antecedents, you, in England, seem to take no notice. About ten years ago the Toronto congregation sent a memorial to the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, asking them, or some of their clerical members, to aid us in selecting and sending out a minister to us. We also described our straitened financial circumstances. That memorial was never answered. No notice, as far as I know, was taken of it, even the courtesy of an acknowledgment of its receipt was not conceded; and the only means I had of knowing that it reached the destination to which it was addressed, was by being permitted to read a private letter from the secretary to a personal friend in Canada, in which he told him the memorial had been received.

"Under these circumstances I hope I will be pardoned for the present liberty, and may be favoured with a reply."

We can only add that we shall be most glad to render any help we can. Perhaps some of our friends on this side the water may have books to spare to help in resuscitating the school library referred to, and if so, we shall be glad for them to be sent to our office, and we will take charge of them and forward them. Only mind—gentle and intelligent reader—no rubbish, if you please! No odd volumes of antiquated divinity! No old grammars and almanacs! None of the sweepings which usually are glorified into an offering of benevolence on such occasions. If you want to help, look on the shelves where the books are which you like, and your children like, and give us—if it be only one—of those.

IRISH CATHOLIC DEMANDS.

In regard to the claims of Cardinal Cullen, speaking in the name of the Roman Catholic bishops in general, to regulate all public education in Ireland, we agree with the Freeman that we can take only one course.

At all risks, even though it should alienate Irish Catholics from the Liberal party, and give to Mr. Disraeli a majority in the Commons, the Non-conformists of the United Kingdom must resist these demands, and refuse to concede a single point to the bishops of the Roman Catholic Church in Ireland. They ask that the youth of the entire country shall be entrusted to the priests. A denominational system of education in Ireland will give to the priests in five-sixths of the parishes a practical educational monopoly. Are we prepared to do this? We admit the injustice of excluding Catholics from any privileges enjoyed by Protestants, and would readily unite in any movement to secure for them ecclesiastical equality. But, in this instance, they claim "for Catholics Catholic education." How is it possible for us, or for the Liberal party, to yield to such a claim? We are a Protestant people. An overwhelming majority regard the Church of Rome with aversion. The proposal to subsidize Catholic teachers to give to Irish Catholics a Catholic education, if seriously entertained by the Government, would evoke the sturdiest opposition from nine-tenths of the nation. As a mere matter of politics, apart from other and higher considerations, the demand cannot be complied with. The Romanists ask the English to undo part of the work done by the Irish Church Act. That act provides for the withdrawal, on liberal terms, of State support from Maynooth College. We should build up again what has just been taken down, if we were to create a Catholic college, or apply the denominational principle to Queen's College. The alternative placed before the country at the last general election was, "Shall we disestablish and disendow the Protestants, or establish and endow the Romanists?" Ireland and England and Scotland were asked "whether they would level up under Mr. Disraeli, or level down under Mr. Gladstone." The answer is found in the Irish Church Act. Shall we in 1870 undo the work of 1869? As Mr. Bright so often insists, there is no retrogression in this country. Conservatives cannot take back what Liberals have wrested from them. The demand, therefore, of Irish Romanists comes too late. If they could point out any inequality, any favour shown to or privilege enjoyed by Protestants and denied to them, equality would be conceded. But no injustice is done them by the mixed system of education. Catholics are not excluded from the management of the schools. There is no religious test applied to teachers. The schools are not used for proselytising purposes. We allow that a mixed system of education may be unfavourable to the interests of the Roman Catholic Church, that the education of the intellect and instruction in morals and history, if free from the manipulation of the priest, may inspire a love of liberty and a manly independence which would indispose the intelligent and the cultured to a surrender of private judgment. What then? We cannot make State arrangements with a view to secure the Roman Catholic or any other Church against loss or prejudice. If an ecclesiastical community cannot hold its own among rival communities, it is not the duty of the civil power to grant it privileges and endowments, and to maintain it in its separate exclusiveness. Let a clear stage, but no favour, be afforded to all. We consequently counsel firmness in refusing to concede the claim put in by the Irish Roman Catholic bishops. They plead for State-supported Catholic education to-day, on the ground that the Irish people desire it. To-morrow, on the same ground, they may plead for a State recognition and establishment of the Roman Catholic Church. What is just and fair should be done for and in Ireland, whether the Irish ask for it or not; but we cannot admit that the acceptance of the Romanists of Ireland of the programme of their bishops would be a sufficient reason for the adoption by a British Parliament of Catholic education for Catholics.

THE BEECHER FAMILY.

A "MEMBER of Congress" wrote to the Times last week, saying, apropos of the Byron story, that "the Beechers are mere sensationalists, without true merit or substantial talents." To this "A Citizen of the United States," conjectured to be Mr. Motley, replied:

"The fame of the Beecher family dates backward for half a century. The Rev. Lyman Beecher, D.D., the father of Mrs. Stowe, was for nearly forty years the veritable apostle of the Congregational and Presbyterian Churches in the United States; a man the grandeur and power of whose pulpit oratory have been scarcely surpassed by his famous son, Henry Ward Beecher. The latter is an enthusiast and an innovator, and by many branded as a fanatic, but his scholarship and his eloquence are alike far beyond all question. A man whose single voice gathers, and for twenty years retains, a congregation of many thousands, and whose individual utterances, during the same period, attract the fervent admiration of one entire section of our country, and the no less ardent hatred of the other—needs no word of mine to give assurance that his name is not 'written on the roll of common men,' or that there is, in and of him, far more than goes to the making of 'a mere sensationalist.'"

"Another brother—Edward Ward Beecher—is a Doctor of Divinity, a preacher of unusual power, for some years pastor of one of the largest churches in Boston, and subsequently (and I believe still) president of one of our great Western Universities."

"Yet another brother—the Rev. Chas. Beecher—is widely known as a preacher of far more than ordinary abilities; and a second sister—Catherine Beecher—has a literary reputation which would be thought high had it not been overshadowed by the world-wide fame of Mrs. Stowe."

"There are several other members of this truly remarkable family whom I will not stop to mention by name; but I believe there is not one among them who has not the reputation of more than ordinary ability; and I am confident that the unanimous voice of public opinion in America—the testimony alike of those who love and of those who hate them—will sustain my assertion of the intellectual pre-eminence of 'the Beecher family.'"

SNUBBING DISSENTERS.

THERE is one miserable relic of the past—one miserable prejudice and superstition from which the journalists who affect to lead us in the present day have not freed themselves, and that is their notion that Dissenters are low vulgar people, and are to be snubbed accordingly. Now, it is clear that these writers—we mean writers in the Saturday Review, Pall Mall, and Spectator—know almost nothing about Dissenters. They seem, for the most part, to take their ideas of them from "Salem Chapel," and to suppose that all the leading members of Dissenting congregations are as vulgar as the grocers and cheesemongers there—which is just as sensible as if Dissenters drew their notions of Church Clergymen from ANTHONY TROLLOPE's pictures, and fancied all bishops were like Bishop PROUDIE, and all rectors and curates like GIBSON and CRAWLEY. We will not suppose that the writers in question wish to do us injustice, and assume what they know all the while to be false. We will allow that they simply suffer themselves to be carried along by the fashion and the prejudices of the class with which they are familiar. But we would appeal to them:—Is it just, is it truthful, is it manly, to go on repeating charges which, at all events, you do not know to be true, which you take no trouble to verify or disprove, and which must give pain, and rouse feelings of indignation in one vast class, and flatter some of the worst and narrowest prejudices in another vast class? You speak with contempt of the parsons who go on repeating as true what they do not know to be true, and might know to be false if they ever examined, but are you not still more contemptible in going on repeating prejudices which you have never examined and which have the tendency to set one part of society against another, and prevent social and political justice from being done? It seems to us that the prejudice prevalent in a certain class against Dissenters is just as childish and senseless as the prejudice of our grandfathers and grandmothers about the French nation, by which they supposed that all Frenchmen were frog-eaters and a kind of cross between a monkey and a tiger. We are trying to rise above our old national prejudices, and to feel that as, on the whole, we know nothing about the character of entire nations, so we will say nothing. But the Dissenters are a great nation, numbering at least nearly as many as Churchmen. Among them there is every variety of life and culture. The manners and education of each class of Dissenters correspond very nearly to the manners and education of a similar class in the other portion of the community. There is as much refinement in the homes of wealthy Dissenters as in the homes of wealthy Churchmen of corresponding grade, while in the homes of the poor there is generally more refinement than in the homes of many of the poor belonging to the Church. It is as absurd, therefore, to characterise this whole Dissenting nation from the defects of some few of its members, as it is to characterise the Americans as people who spit on carpets and sit with their feet on mantelpieces because some members of the family are given to these bad habits.

It is amusing to find our teachers speaking with such scorn of Sectarianism, and yet all the while guilty themselves of the worst kind of Sectarianism. It is the evil of belonging to a sect that it makes a man contract his mind to the limits of his sect. His experience having been confined within these limits, he forms an extravagant estimate of the excellences of those within his sect, an absurd and extravagant prejudice as to the deficiencies of all who are outside it. Our teachers belong—so they assume—to the sect of “Gentlemen,” who again belong to the sect of “The Church.” They have an exaggerated idea of their own gentlemanliness—which does not save them, by-the-by, from much that seems to us very vulgar, coarse, and unmanly—and they speak of us outsiders with as much ignorance and narrow-mindedness as any “Little Bethelite” could do of “the world” which lies outside his narrow circle of the elect.

It is these superstitions which men foster in their minds regarding classes of whom they have really little or no knowledge that weaken our national sympathies and indispose us to do justice between class and class. If we could get to the bottom of people's minds, we fear we should often find that the reasons which are put forward to justify the perpetuation of injustice to Dissenters are not, after all, the real motives of numbers who support this injustice or look upon it with indifference. Deeper than these reasons lie the prejudices against Dissenters, as against people who are low and vulgar, and with whom it would be exceedingly disagreeable to be brought into contact. Churchmen first dress us up as the inquisitors did the heretics, in hateful costume, and then hate us accordingly. As Sydney Smith once said to a Unitarian friend of ours, “You are a highly respectable body, but, let me tell you, awfully unfashionable.”

We Dissenters feel so assured of this temper about us in those who are not Dissenters, that we feel it would be almost hopeless to appeal to them to remove many a minor wrong under which we smart. Hardly can we yet bring the dominant class to listen to us whilst we plead against a great and glaring injustice like that of debarring us from the full privileges of the National Universities. And there are many less forms of injustice which we have long endured, and about which we have been silent. For example, there is the injustice, that whilst every Dissenter who wishes to be married at his own place of worship must see there the Civil Registrar, as if to remind him of his inferiority as a Dissenter in the eye of the law,—on the other hand, the Churchman who chooses to be married at the Parish Church escapes the presence of the civil officer, registration by his clergyman being accepted by the law as sufficient for the legalisation of the rite. Now here is an inequality, a badge of inferiority which we, both ministers and people, cannot help feeling. It is just one of those vulgar snubs giving annoyance, and yet serving no good purpose, which a truly gentlemanly class would scorn to support or even permit. The subject was discussed at some length in the Wesleyan Conference, and while the majority of the Conference were willing to leave the matter in the hands of the Legislature, they insisted that complete equality and uniformity of practice should be enforced in all churches. We agree with the Conference, but we know very well that we shall have to wait a long time before the equality will be attained. The nation, and those who assume to educate the nation, must first make more progress in escaping from old anti-social prejudices and in knowledge of English society as it really is.

X.

Just now, when Mrs. Beecher Stowe's revelation of the cause of Lady Byron's separation from her husband has drawn public attention to her, the following notices are peculiarly interesting.

In November, 1852, referring to a chat which he had had with Frederick Robertson about her, H. C. R. says, “he speaks of her as the noblest woman he ever knew.”

In the following year, Mr. Robinson made her acquaintance, and on September 13th writes: “I called by desire on Lady Byron—a call which I enjoyed, and which may have consequences. Recollecting her history, as the widow of the most famous, though not the greatest, poet of England in our day, I felt an interest in going to her; and that interest was greatly heightened when I left her. From all I have heard of her, I consider her one of the best women of the day. Her means and her good will both great. ‘She lives to do good,’ says Dr. King, and I believe this to be true.”

In a letter to H. C. R., February 2nd, 1854, Dr. King says: “Lady Byron is now recovered. She is always feeble, and obliged to husband her strength, and calculate her powers; but her mind is ever intact, pure, and lofty. It seems to pour forth its streams of benevolence and judgment even from the sick bed; a perennial fountain. Her state of mind has always given me confidence in her severest illnesses. Yet her power of bearing fatigue occasionally, as during the illness and death of her daughter, is as wonderful.”

Writing to Mr. Robinson, March 5th, 1855, on Dr. Kennedy's account of Lord Byron's opinions, she says: “Strange as it may seem, Dr. Kennedy is most faithful where you doubt his being so. Not merely from casual expressions, but from the whole tenor of Lord Byron's feelings, I could not but conclude he was a believer in the inspiration of the Bible, and had the gloomiest Calvinistic tenets. To that unhappy view of the relation of the creature to the Creator I have always ascribed the misery of his life. It is enough for me to remember, that he who thinks his transgressions beyond forgiveness (and such was his own deepest feeling) has righteousness beyond that of the self-satisfied sinner; or, perhaps, of the half-awakened. It was impossible for me to doubt that, could he have been at once assured of pardon, his living faith in moral duty and his love of virtue (‘I love the virtues which I cannot claim’) would have conquered every temptation. Judge, then, how I must hate the creed which made him see God as an Avenger, not a Father. My own impressions were just the reverse, but could have little weight; and it was in vain to seek to turn his thoughts for long from that idée fixe, with which he connected his physical peculiarity as a stamp. Instead of being made happier by any apparent good, he felt convinced that every blessing would be ‘turned into a curse’ to him. Who, possessed by such ideas, could lead a life of love and service to God or man? They must in a measure realise themselves. ‘The worst of it is, I do believe,’ he said. I, like all connected with him, was broken against the rock of Predestination. I may be pardoned for referring to his frequent expression of the sentiment that I was only sent to show him the happiness he was forbidden to enjoy. You will now better understand why ‘The Deformed Transformed’ is too painful to me for discussion.”

On the other hand, the Countess Guiccioli (by no means so trustworthy an informant) in her “Recollections” tells us that even in his youth he says, “All very tedious. I hate books treating of religious subjects; although I adore and love God, freed from all absurd and blasphemous notions.” We find him at a later period writing of himself, “As for me, in my early youth, when I left college, where I had to bow to very superior and stronger minds, who themselves were under various evil influences of college and of youth, I was more than heterodox. Time and reflection have changed my mind upon these subjects, and I consider Atheism as a folly.” We have his friend Shelley, too, the confessed Atheist, writing a few days before his own death: “Pray assure Moore that, in a philosophical point of view, I have not the slightest influence over Byron. If I had, to be sure, I should use it for the purpose of uprooting his delusions and his errors.” In the work which Lady Byron speaks of, there is an account of an interesting discussion which the poet had with Dr. Kennedy, which we may here mention. Byron said, “There is a book which I must show you, ‘Illustrations of the Moral Government of God,’ by E. Smith, M.D., of London. The author of the book proved that hell was not a place of eternal punishment.” “This is no new doctrine,” replied Kennedy. “The author will sooner or later reject the Bible entirely,” and more in the same strain. Byron remarked, “I cannot admit the soundness of your argument; for God may allow sin and misery to co-exist for a time, but His goodness must prevail in the end, and cause their existence to cease. At any rate, it is better to believe that the infinite goodness of God, while allowing evil to exist as a means of our arriving at perfection, will show itself still greater some day, when every intellectual being shall be purified and freed from the bondage of sin and misery.” His words, too, addressed a few hours before his death to Mr. Parry, deserve notice: “Eternity and space are before me; but on this subject, thank God, I am happy and at ease. The thought of living eternally, and of again reviving, is a great pleasure. Christianity is the purest and most liberal religion in the world; but the numerous teachers who are constantly worrying mankind with their denunciations and their doctrines, are the greatest enemies of religion. I have read with more attention than half of them the Book of Christianity, and I admire the liberal and truly charitable principles which Christ has laid down. There are questions connected with this subject which none but Almighty God can solve. Time and space, who can conceive? None but God. On Him I rely.”

To return to the Diary. On April 11th, 1855, writing to H. C. R. about the National Review, which she had heard was to be the Prospective amplified, Lady Byron says: “Not satisfactory to me, because I have always thought that periodical too Unitarian, in the sense of separating itself from other churches, if not by a high wall, at least by a wire-gauze fence. Now, separation is to me the apeiros. The revelation through Nature never separates; it is the revelation through the Book which separates. Whewell and Brewster would have been one had they not, I think equally, dimmed their lamps of science when reading their Bibles. As long as we think a truth better for being shut up in a text, we are not of the wide-world religion, which is to include all in one fold; for that text will not be accepted by the followers of other books, or students of the same, and separation will ensue. The Christian Scripture should be dear to us, not as the charter of a few, but of mankind, and to fashion it into cages is to deny its ultimate objects. These thoughts hot, like the roll at breakfast, where your letter was so welcome an addition.”

Writing of the National, April 12th, 1856, she says on one of the articles: “Some theological fictions seem to me to be more completely exposed than ever before—the two Atonement theories, for instance. And yet the Reviewer does not appear to me to come to the point at last, nor entirely to have dismissed the mysterious efficacy doctrine. My own belief would, at least, be stated more simply, thus: to follow Christ is the way to be reconciled, or put in a relation of peace and harmony with the will of God; a man so reconciled becomes a sound man, if he was not before. If some say that the same end might be obtained in other ways, I am not anxious to refute them; only grant this way to be successful. Did Jesus say, ‘I am the only way,’ &c.? It is inferred that he meant it, however, from the condemnation of him who ‘believeth not,’ in St. John. This is thought a parenthesis of the writer's, by a superior critic; but, taking the common reading, I see in it no more than the assertion, that belief in the truths proclaimed by Christ was an absolute condition of salvation; and all experience shows it to be so in fact. The believer in those principles is saved from the hell of ‘malice, hatred, and all uncharitableness.’ I need not try to believe this; I can't help it.”

In the same letter, on another article in the National, she observes: "The author appears to me to have the mind which could dispel the illusions surrounding another poet [Lord Byron] without depreciating his claims (not fully acknowledged by you) to the truest inspiration. Who has sought to distinguish the holy from the unholy in that spirit?—to prove by this very degradation of the one how high the other was? A character is never done justice to by extenuating faults; so I do not agree to nisi bonum. It is kinder to read the blotted page."

OUR PRESTON CHAPEL AND ITS MINISTERS.

ONE of the Preston newspapers is just now giving a series of sketches, in the main both clever and fair, of the Preston "Churches and Chapels: their Parsons, Priests, and Congregations." Among them the Unitarian chapel forms the subject of an article which, after giving an account—a tolerably just one, too—of Unitarianism itself, thus continues: "The edifice wherein our Unitarian friends assemble every Sunday, is an old-fashioned, homely-looking, little building—a tiny, Quakerised piece of architecture, simple to a degree, prosaic, diminutive, snug, dull. It is just such a place as you could imagine old primitive Nonconformists, fonder of strong principles and inherent virtue than of external embellishment and masonic finery, would build. A small, and somewhat neat, graveyard is attached to the chapel; there are several tombstones laid flat upon the ground; and in the centre of it there is a rather elaborate one, substantially railed round, and surmounting the vault of the Ainsworth family. The remains of the late W. Ainsworth, Esq., a well known and respected Preston gentleman, are interred here. At the northern side of, and directly adjoining, the chapel there is a small Sunday-school. It was erected about 15 years ago, the scholars previous to that time having met in a little building in Lord's-walk. The average attendance of scholars at present is about 60. The chapel, internally, is small, clean, plain, and ancient looking. A central aisle runs directly up to the pulpit, and it is flanked with a range of high old-fashioned pews, some being plain, a few lined with a red-coloured material, and several with faded green baize, occasionally tacked back and elaborated with good old-fashioned brass nails. The seats vary in size, and include both the moderately narrow and the full square for family use. There are nine variously shaped windows in the building: through three of them you can see sundry things ranging from the spire of the Parish Church to the before-mentioned wall with the broken glass top; through some of the others faint outlines of chimneys may be traced. The chapel is light and comfortable-looking. There seems to be nothing in the place having the least relationship to ornament except four small gas brackets, which are trimmed up a little, and surmounted with small crosses of the Greek pattern. At the west end, supported by two pillars, there is a small gallery, in which a few elderly people, the scholars, and the choir are deposited. The body of the chapel will accommodate about 200 persons. The average attendance, excluding the scholars, will be perhaps 60. When we visited the place there were 50 present—45 down stairs and five in the gallery; and of this 50, upwards of 30 were females. The congregation is quite of a genteel and superior character. There are a few rather poor people embraced in it; but nine out of ten of the regular worshippers belong to either independent or prosperous middle class families. The congregation, although still "highly respectable," is not so influential in tone as it used to be. A few years ago, six or seven county magistrates might have been seen in the chapel on a Sunday, and they were all actual "members" of the body; but death and other causes have reduced the number of this class very considerably, and now not more than two are constant worshippers. There is neither sham, shoddy, nor rant in the place. From one year end to another you will never hear any of them during any of the services rush into a florid yell or reduce their spiritual emotions to a dull groan. They abstain from everything in the contortional and ejaculative line; quiet contemplative intellectualism appears to reign amongst them; a dry, tranquil thoughtfulness, pervades the body. They are eclectic, optimistic, cool; believe in taking things comfortably; never conjure up during their devotions the olden pictures of orthodoxy; never allow their nerves to be shattered with notions about the "devil," or the "burning lake" in which sinners have to be heated for ever and ever; never hear of such things from the pulpit; wouldn't tolerate them if they did; think that they can get on well enough without them. They may be right or they may be wrong; but, like all sections of Christians, they believe their own denominational child the best. There are two services every Sunday in the Unitarian chapel—morning and evening—and both are very good in one sense because both are very short. There have been many ministers at the chapel since its transformation into a Unitarian place of worship; but we need not unearth musty records and name them all. Within modern memory there have been just a trinity of ministers at the chapel—the Rev. Joseph Ashton, an exceedingly quiet, unassuming, well learned man, who would have taken a higher stand in the town than he did if he had made more fuss about himself; the Rev. W. Croke Squier, who made too much fuss, who had too big a passion for Easter-due martyrdoms, and the like, for Corn Exchange speeches, patriotic agony points, and virtuous fighting; but who was nevertheless a sharp-headed, quick-sighted, energetic little gentleman; and the Rev. R. J. Orr—the present minister—who came to Preston about a year and a half since. Mr. Orr is an Irishman, young in years, tall, cold, timid, quiet, yet excellently educated. He is critical, seems slightly cynical, and moves along as if he either knew nobody or didn't want to look at anybody. There is somewhat of the student, and somewhat of the college professor in his appearance. But he is a very sincere man; has neither show nor fussiness in him; and practices his duties with a strict, quiet regularity. He may have moods of mirth and high moments of sparkling glee, but he looks as if he had never laughed right out but about once in his life, and had repented of it directly afterwards. If he had more dash and less shyness in him, less learned coolness and much more humour in his composition, he would reap a better harvest in both pulpit and general life. Mr. Orr is no roaring Will-o'-the-Wisp minister; what he says he means; and what he means he reads. His prayers and sermons are all read. He is not eloquent, but his language is scholarly, sometimes choice, always exact. He never allows himself to be led away by passion; sticks well to his text; invariably keeps his temper. He wears neither surplice nor black gown in the pulpit, and does quite as well without as with them. The services in the main are simple, free from all boisterous balderdash, and if not of such a character as would suit everybody, are evidently well liked by those participating in them.

THE RELIGION OF THE ANCIENT GREEKS.

THE Rev. T. W. Chignell delivered a lecture last Sunday evening, Sept. 12th, in George's Chapel, Exeter, on the religion of the ancient Greeks, as seen in the drama of the Antigone of Sophocles.

Of all the religious ideas (he said) that were stirring the minds of men at that hour, there was not one that was more predominant, or that so delighted the best of these minds, as the thought that the same great fundamental religious conceptions and tendencies had belonged ever to the human race, and had specially manifested themselves, in strength and clearness, among the greatest nations of the world. Look at what that had brought with it. For one thing, how it reconciled the present with the past, and bound humanity (separated as it was by such differences of race) in its very heart's core into one. Again, how it confirmed their faith in the great fundamental conceptions and tendencies of religion to find them glimmering in every savage breast, and deeply rooted in every great literature of the world; whilst again what fresh elements were opened up to men. It had been well said—"Least one good custom should corrupt the world." That was to say, things were out in this form and that mode, and the spirit of them must assume new forms and new modes. They had lately seen a Ruskin and a Gladstone reverently studying deep religious truths that had been uttered by the ancient Greeks. Who did not share in that interest, especially in these days when they were taught to believe that religion was only to be found in certain phrases? What emancipation to the mind it was to be told that here, under this Greek form, or yonder in the old Indian form, deep religious truth was to be found. The Greek nation was a deeply religious one. Sophocles, one of their great poets, was a very religious man. He wrote about five hundred years before Christ taught. Having given an outline of the story of the Antigone, the lecturer first alluded to the healthy tone that was seen in the drama concerning man. It spoke of man as "wonderful"—"nothing so wonderful as man"—thus showing that the old Greek conception of man was in harmony with that of the eighth Psalm in the Hebrew Bible. The Bible had the same tone about man as the Greek drama had, but Christendom had not. The verdict of Christendom concerning human nature was for the most part a degraded and really blasphemous one. It may be said that the old Roman Catholic notion of human nature, inherited by modern Protestantism, was an incubus upon the poor, tender heart of man; it relaxed the nerves of his moral nature; and when it degenerated into a cant, it was the most pitiable thing that could be upon human lips. Better far to take this old conception of man, taught in Athens five hundred years before Christ, and likewise taught in the Bible and by Christ himself. The lecturer alluded to the reverence the old Greeks had for the human corpse, which was the tender breath of this drama of Antigone. Then next he wished them to notice especially the conception the Greeks had, in this poem, of divine law. Antigone spoke of the "unwritten laws." The lesson here taught was that all written law was but a poor attempt to copy the unwritten. In every place and time man must say—"What is this piece of parchment, written over thus, as compared with the actual unwritten law of God concerning the matter?" "God's law is alive; your parchment law is dead," said Antigone. The laws of God were, in this poem, said to be "eternally steadfast," which were far better than the modern theory—that morality changed with every age and changing fashion of man, and was an open question. Having spoken of the delight in life which the Greeks always manifested, the lecturer referred to what was said in the poem on forgiveness, when man had transgressed the divine laws. The blind old prophet, conversing with the King, told him it was common for all men to go wholly wrong; but if having erred, having fallen into evil, the man amended, and did not persist in his evil course, he would be no longer foolish and unblest. Was not that solace for man—balm, pure and perfect, for his moral wounds? That was the whole matter of forgiveness, treated in this tender, consolatory way, by this Greek poet. There was something very affecting to the Christian mind to meet with this healing message, which was taught by Christ, taught thus in old Athens, 500 years before he appeared on the earth. He (the lecturer) knew that a very different spirit, with regard to human faults, prevailed in these days. We have lately seen (continued Mr. Chignell) a woman digging at the grave of one long dead. Whose grave, I ask, is this you are digging at, and what are you digging there for? Is it the grave of one whom the world hates, or of one whom the world in the main has loved? And pray what are you digging there for? "To uncover his hideous features to the world." The world knows him—every fibre of him—nobody ever laid himself open before the world more than he did. And yet the world loves him, and does not want anyone to uncover his faults. The world wants you to speak well of him. He was a man of such marvellous divine splendour of gifts—aye, and of inner divine lodgings, too—that the world, looking upon the splendour, scarcely saw the deep shadow cast by it. Once more the man is dead, and when a man dies, if his life has been a mixture of good and evil, and especially if the good has predominated, the earthly part falls away, and the heavenly part soars aloft and shines like a pure star before the spirits of men. Once more we are taught by Sophocles, and still more by Christ, that, if a man errs ever so deeply, if he begins to work himself into clearer light—out of his discords into clearer harmony—the clouds and the discords are left behind him, and are no longer related to him at all. They are looked upon as mere masks that covered his divine features for a time; and when they are stripped off the world says—"Here is the man, and there lies the wretched disfiguring mask." Clough, the poet, and Carlyle, both held that as Byron approached nearer to the close of his life—and he died young, it should be remembered, at the age, I believe, of thirty-six—he was beginning to clear himself from his errors, was getting into higher, clearer light, and purer harmony of self. Goethe, in his Faust, makes the angels sing, as they bear away Faust's "immortal part"—"Whoever strives and keeps on striving, him can we redeem." That was especially the Christian sentiment, and it was likewise the sentiment of the old Greeks. In conclusion, the lecturer summed up the religious belief of the Greeks (as shown in this drama of Antigone), by referring to their deep-rooted faith in immortality; to their profound sense of God, and of His presence everywhere, and to the absolute horror they had of reckless self-will, in which they saw nothing but ruin, and in which they heard nothing but the bodeful moaning of the waves of divine retribution.

AMERICAN NOTES.

The Nation says, "the Labour Convention at Philadelphia, which has just closed its sittings, was remarkable for the admission of coloured delegates on a footing of full and perfect equality, and for the attention and respect with which they were always listened to. What was more gratifying, though not half so surprising, was that no speeches were half so well worth listening to as those of these same delegates, or contained nearly so much good sense and good feeling. The remarks of one of them about the national debt, concerning which there seemed to be a good deal of confusion, if not of unsoundness, in the convention, were especially worthy of note, and ought to have put many an ignorant or hardened white man to the blush.

A site, comprising 15 acres of land, in a pleasant locality, having a fine view of Staten Island and New Jersey, and lying open to the fresh sea-breezes, has been set apart for the erection, on a large scale, of an Inebriate Home for King's County, New York. Some two years ago, a charter was obtained for the Home, and about £30,000 appropriated for the purchase of the land and for the requisite buildings; and subsequently an Act was passed by the Legislature of New York, granting it about £1,500 a-year from the excise licence fees and from the fines levied in King's County for violation of the excise laws. The building is to consist of four storeys, with a basement; and is to be divided into two portions—one for such patients as may come voluntarily, and be able to pay for their accommodation; the other for such persons as being “habitual drunkards,” shall be sent there by the police justices of King’s County. Six months is the longest time either class can be detained, except by their own request. The Home will provide accommodation for 300 inmates—100 voluntary or paying patients, and 200 involuntary ones, sent by the justices.

Mrs. Stowe’s disclosure of the Byron secret, which was made simultaneously in the Atlantic, and in Macmillan, seems to have excited scarcely less discussion in the States than here. The Nation thinks, and we agree with it, that she “must have mistaken or mis-remembered some of Lady Byron’s statements; and, in her desire to make as striking a picture as she could of her friend’s sufferings during her marriage, overlooked the inferences so damaging to her memory which the world would draw from the story as it stands.” And it gives these reasons for thinking so:

“In the first place, part of Mrs. Stowe’s statement of the case is manifestly impossible. Lady Byron could not have had ‘two years of convulsive struggle’ with this horror unless we suppose that Byron told her of it six months before he was engaged to her. The separation took place in the middle of January, 1816, and the engagement was entered into in the middle of September, 1814—only sixteen months before. The marriage was performed—we can hardly say solemnised or celebrated—on the 2nd of January, 1815. Ada was born on the 10th of the next December following, and Lady Byron left her husband, never to return, in the middle of January, as we have just said. Their married life, therefore, covered but a few days more than one year, to which Lady Byron’s sufferings from this cause must have been limited, supposing that Byron made the communication on the marriage-day. This, however, does not go to the bottom of the matter; for a day’s condonation of such a crime would be, in the eye of the law and of common sense, a guilty consenting to it. But there is another version of the story which, while it does not change the central infamy, is most honourable to Lady Byron’s character and memory, and which we feel sure will be ultimately established as the true one. We were told the main facts of this history something more than ten years ago, and this was how it was told to us: At whatever time the grave sin with which Byron is charged may have begun, Lady Byron knew nothing of it, as we heard the story, until after the birth of her child. Some time after that event, probably about the beginning of January, 1816, Byron told her of the intrigue, saying that he had never loved any other woman than the partner of his guilt. She, naturally, supposed it to be a delusion of insanity; and it was under this impression that she consulted Doctor Baillie about him, which is one of his main charges against her in his letters and in ‘Don Juan.’ It was while under this belief that she wrote the playful letter to Byron, after leaving him, which is also one of the counts in the indictment against her. After reaching Kirkby Mallory, her father’s house, she had certain proofs of the truth of what her husband had told her, from which time she left him for ever.

“Now, we do not affirm that this version of the story is absolutely authentic. We tell it as it was told to us; but most certainly it is inherently more probable than the one given by Mrs. Stowe. It is a key to the whole mystery, and the solution is greatly honourable to Lady Byron. It accounts for her silence as to the cause of the separation. Her lips were sealed as long as Mrs. Leigh lived. It accounts for her consultation with Dr. Baillie, and for her letter after leaving Byron, and before knowing that a separation was inevitable. It accounts, too, for Dr. Lushington’s statements confirming her own, saying that ‘a reconciliation was impossible; and that if such an idea should be entertained he could not, professionally or otherwise, take any part towards effecting it.’ Of course he could not, as a man of honour. It may be doubted, however, whether he would have considered it as impossible, though equally he could have taken no part in it, if he had been told by Lady Byron that she had continued to live with her husband as his wife for months, weeks, or a single day after knowing his guilt.”

It is not from any liking for a puzzle that we have referred to this subject at all, but we agree with the Nation that Mrs. Stowe’s statement, as it stands, is calculated to leave an unfavourable impression of Lady Byron’s character, which we believe to have been such as it is described in the extracts from Mr. Crabb Robinson’s “Diary,” and we are inclined to think that the story as told by our American contemporary is the true one.

SWADDLERS.

It is strange how prone theologians are to make use of offensive nicknames, which, they must be aware, are hardly calculated to “provoke to love.” We have an instance of this in Cardinal Cullen’s recent rescript, into which he introduces the term “Swaddler,” which the Roman Catholics of Ireland employ to designate Protestants. In his “Life of Wesley,” Southey thus gives the origin of the term: “It happened that Cennick, preaching on Christmas Day, took for his text these words from St. Luke’s Gospel, ‘And this shall be a sign unto you; ye shall find the babe wrapped in swaddling clothes lying in a manger.’ A Catholic who was present, and to whom the language of Scripture was a novelty, thought this so ludicrous that he called the preacher a ‘swaddler’ in derision, and this unmeaning word became the nickname of the Methodists, and had all the effect of the most opprobrious appellation.”

THE NEW TESTAMENT UNDER A NEW ASPECT.

In an article in this month’s Macmillan, with this heading, Mr. George Grove has some remarks on Baron Tauchnitz’s edition of the New Testament, the substance of which may be interesting to those of our readers who have not had the opportunity of studying the subject.

After showing the way in which the “Received Text” of the Greek New Testament was formed, and intimating its imperfections, he speaks of the three great manuscripts which were subsequently discovered, and are of more exact execution than any others. The first of these, the “Vatican MS.,” is in the Vatican at Rome; the second, the “Alexandrine MS.,” in the British Museum; and the third, the “Sinaitic MS.,” at St. Petersburg. The date at which the first and third were written is somewhere between A.D. 330 and 350, the second a century or so later. These are admitted by critics to contain the nearest approach which we possess to the original writings of the Testament. No doubt there is a great difference between even these early copies and the books as they left the hands of the authors. If we could compare the original Gospel or Epistle with what it had become after only 250 years of copying and re-copying, we should find an immense difference. This is inevitable, as we may see if we think of the mistakes which perpetually occur even in re-printing in our own day, when verbal accuracy is so much regarded. Mr. Grove then proceeds to point out what Baron Tauchnitz, with the help of Professor Tischendorf, has done. He has printed the New Testament as it stands in the English Bible, and put at the bottom of the page all the variations between it and the three great manuscripts just spoken of.

The first thing that strikes one on looking at these foot-notes is how often the sign “omit” occurs; in other words, how large a proportion of the differences consists of additions to the original. There are many transpositions of words, and here and there words have to be added which have dropped out in the process of copying; but these are not nearly so numerous as those which are marked as redundant.

Of these redundancies, the first are those which appear to have had for their object to elucidate or confirm the text. The owner of a copy of the Gospels, say in the fifth or sixth century, observes that a sentence is obscure and liable to be misunderstood for want of a word of explanation; or a text from the Old Testament is quoted, and, as he thinks, wrongly; or a pronoun is given where he conceives that the proper name would be more intelligible; or the name of a place or person seems to want explanation; or a saying or narrative is stated in different words from the parallel passage in another Gospel. In cases like these what so natural as to add the correction or the supplemental words? Sometimes this would be done in the margin, sometimes in the body of the manuscript. In process of time, this with its alterations went into the hands of a copyist, who then, according to his lights or his bias, inserted the whole or part of the alterations, possibly with some further additions of his own, all which from that day forward became, in that uncritical age, indistinguishable and inseparable from the original work.

Occasionally these additions have a theological motive, as in Luke iv., 41, where “Christ” has been inserted—“Thou art Christ the Son of God;” or John ix., 35, where “Son of God” has been substituted for “Son of Man.” Sometimes they may have arisen, as Matt. xxvii., 35, or Mark xv., 28, from the anxiety of a commentator to square the facts of the New Testament with the prophecies of the Old. More remarkable still are those additions which contain some of the most characteristic and “Christian” sentiments in the whole of the Testament. There can be little doubt that the account of the woman taken in adultery, John vii., 53, to viii., 11, which so clearly embodies the justice, mercy, and tenderness of Christ, did not exist in the original Gospel. And there are several other shorter passages which are hardly less characteristic than this story. The beautiful narrative in Luke ix., 54-56, loses not only the reference to the act of Elijah, which has always seemed so appropriate to the locality, but it loses what appears as the very kernel of its teaching, the whole of the words printed in italics being an interpolation in copies made after the middle of the 5th century:—“And when his disciples James and John saw this, they said Lord, wilt thou that we command fire to come down from heaven and consume them, even as Elias did? But he turned and rebuked them, and said, Ye know not what manner of spirit ye are of, for the Son of Man is not come to destroy men’s lives, but to save them.”

The precept so parallel to this in spirit, Mark xi., 26, “For if ye do not forgive, neither will your Father which is in heaven forgive your trespasses,” is in like manner an interpolation of later date than either the Sinaitic or the Vatican MS. Even the utterance of our Lord on the cross, Luke xxiii., 34, “Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do,” must be erased from the original draft of the record. The same is the case with the words in the Sermon on the Mount, “Bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them which despitefully use you.” Another interpolation which, though it has escaped being inserted in the Received Text, is so full of wisdom and goodness, and so appropriate to some of the questions of our day, that we feel loth to lose it, is in Luke vi., 4, “On the same day he saw a certain man working on the Sabbath, and he said unto him, Man, if indeed thou knowest what thou doest, blessed art thou; but if thou knowest not, thou art cursed and a transgressor of the law.”

Now, what shall we say of such sentences as these? They cannot surely be the invention of those who inserted them in the later MSS. There is something about them which forbids us to question their authenticity, or to ascribe them to any one but Jesus himself. On the other hand, the fact of their omission in the oldest copies seems to show that they did not form part of the original Gospels. They must belong to the same category with those “words of the Lord Jesus” which are preserved in the Acts of the Apostles xx., 35, “It is more blessed to give than to receive,” and with those countless “things” that might have filled the “world itself,” the recollection of which, so many years after, forced St. John to speak of his own Gospel as a mere skeleton sketch of the life of his Master. Certainly, if in some respects we have lost by the inaccurate and redundant Text of Erasmus and Stephens, in other respects we have gained; for a Testament without the story of the woman taken in adultery, and without the other gracious words that have been quoted, would be robbed of some of its most precious gems, even though it be the fact that those gems did not form part of the Gospels as they left the hands of their authors.

The longest of the interpolations in the Gospels, and the only one which remains to be noticed, is the conclusion of that of Mark, in which the verses from verse 9 to the end of the chapter, though a very ancient addition, are not found in the oldest copies, and therefore cannot be accepted as from the hand of the Evangelist. But this passage is of a very different nature from those just noticed, and breathes a far less Christian spirit than that which distinguishes them.

Any one who will take this Tauchnitz edition of the Testament, and mark out with a pencil the passages specified as omitted in the three oldest manuscripts, or in two of them, will be astonished at the alterations in the face of those familiar pages, and be led, we should think, to see how utterly untenable the idea of anything like verbal inspiration must be. And if at first the phrases often seem bolder, and the sentences less fluent and more abrupt than before, he will find these deficiencies made up for by greater life and greater reality, and will have the satisfaction of knowing that he has come much closer to the original condition of a document which all must desire to possess as nearly as possible in its original form, and has caught a trifle less faintly the echoes of that Divine voice, for the tones of which men were never more eagerly listening than they are now.

TO J. C. W.

ON THE BIRTH OF A LITTLE GIRL.

How sweet to have a baby girl,
And call her all your own;
Not one so near, not one so dear,
As you alone!

Her eyes are like to yonder sky,
So beautifully blue;
Her lips so sweet, for kisses meet;
Her breath like dew.

Her cheeks aglow with faintest rose,
Beneath the pearly skin;
Her curly hair, so soft, so fair
Her dimpled chin.

She weeps—at once you swiftly fly,
Each little grief allay;
She smiles—"What bliss can equal this?"
You joyful say.

You love to feel against your cheek
The perfect little face;
So soft and warm, each baby charm,
So full of grace.

Oh, then 'tis sweet to have this babe,
And call her all your own;
Not one so near, not one so dear
As you alone.

CANOVA AND BUONAPARTE.

In his "Diary" Mr. Crabb Robinson relates the following interesting anecdote of Canova, which was told him by Flaxman, the sculptor. He had breakfasted with Canova at Mr. Hope's, and then examined with him the marbles and antiques. Among them was a beautiful bust of Antoninus Pius. Flaxman pointed it out to Canova, on which Canova, without answering him, muttered to himself with gesticulations of impatience, "I told him so,—I told him so,—but he would never take counsel." This was repeated several times in a fit of absence. At length Flaxman tapped him on the shoulder and said, "Whom did you tell so?" Of course, the conversation was in Italian. Receiving no reply, Flaxman pressed the question. "Why, Buonaparte," said he. "I observed to him repeatedly that the busts of Antoninus Pius were to be seen everywhere; they were to be found in every part of Italy in great abundance, he had made himself so beloved. But he would take no advice." "And did you expect him to take any?" said Flaxman. Canova could not say that he did, but stated that the courtiers of Buonaparte were often astonished at the freedoms he took.

CHURCH CURIOSITIES.—XXII.

A PROPER PRECAUTION.

A Bavarian journalist records one of the well-known characteristics of King Louis of Bavaria, the grandfather of the present king, in this fashion: "When his Majesty repaired to the gate of Paradise he was somewhat provoked by an amount of delay and a hesitation in St. Peter as to admitting him, and petulantly asked 'if he did not know who he was?' St. Peter, too much occupied with an interlocutor inside, made no reply, and the question was once more asked in a tone of greater urgency, when the Saint responded, 'One moment's patience, your Majesty. They are only locking up St. Ursula and the eleven thousand virgins, and you shall be admitted in an instant.'"

DIFFERENT MEN DIFFERENT INTERESTS.

A neighbouring farmer in a remote district of the Yorkshire wolds met a country rector who had been two years absent on travel. "Mr. Rector," said the farmer, "you've been to the Holy Land, I hear." "I have, John, and got safe back, you see." "Well, I often thought I'd like to hear about that spot. It's a fine country, I lay." "Well," said the rector, "I saw Lebanon, and Jerusalem, and the Twelve Palmtrees, and the wells of water in the Great Desert; and we went across the Jordan, and went up Mount ——" "Excuse me interruptin' you, Mr. Rector, noo. But if it be a fair question, hoo was turnmets (turnips) looking out yonder?"

CRITICS ASSES?

In Johnson's Dictionary there is a curious error which has only lately been noticed. It occurs in the definition of the verb "To sit," and pervades every edition hitherto, even that of Todd. "Asses are ye that sit in judgment" (Judges v. 10). The verse in the Bible, of course, runs: "Speak, ye that ride on white asses, ye that sit in judgment." Were not Dr. Johnson's reverence for the Scriptures too well known to allow of the supposition that he would wilfully have turned any part of them into a jest, we might suppose that he intended here to express by anticipation the low estimate which he formed of contemporary critics.

DISCRETION REQUIRED IN TEXTS.

A Scotch elder, on learning from his minister that he proposed a series of lectures on Revelation, cautioned him, "I've nae objection to ye takin' a quiet trot through the seven churches, but for on'y sake drive canny among thae seals and trumpets." Probably a relation, this of the old Scotch woman, a great lover of the good old Calvinistic doctrines, and a great hater of "screeds o' cauld morality," who, on her minister, whom she suspected of being hardly "soond," giving out a very practical text from the Sermon on the Mount, ejaculated, "Hech, but if there's an ill text i' a' the Bible that chiel's sure to tak' it."

THE USE OF BEAUTY.

BY ROBERT LEIGHTON.

To what end is it that the soul thus cleaves
To beauty, that around the meanest things
The semblances of higher thought it weaves,
Seeking to give them wings?

While lowly wants they cater, plate and jug
Give nectar and ambrosia through the eyes;
We needs must find, too, on footstool and rug
Fruits, flowers, clouds, and skies.

And what superfluous beauty in our ships,
Given with such lavish heart unto the waves!
We may not be without it; it equips
Our cradles and our graves.

So, too, with what unwearied, wasteful hand
Nature provides it for us, night and day!
All seasons bring it; sky and sea and land
Are giving it away.

And to what end? that we may be imbued
With life that runs beyond the earthly goal;
For beauty is the everlasting food
That nourishes the soul.

INTELLIGENCE.

BIRMINGHAM: LOWER FAZELEY-STREET.—The eighth anniversary sermons were preached on Sunday last, September 12th, in the morning by the Rev. B. Wright, of Hurst-street Chapel, and in the evening by Mr. G. R. Twinn, secretary of the society. The congregations were large in the evening, the meeting room being crowded. The collections, including a few special subscriptions and donations, amounted to £18. 1s. 9d. The annual tea meeting was held on the following evening, Monday, September 13th. There was a large attendance. After tea the chair was taken by Mr. B. Whitehouse, and the report of which the following is an abstract, was read by the secretary:

Sunday Schools.—Boys' Sunday-school: 293 scholars, thirty teachers. The monthly "Missionary" collections have produced £4. 4s. 5½d. Nearly fifty prizes were given in February. Library, 515 volumes; issues for the year, 801. Sick club, 46 subscribers; amount, £23. 11s. 11½d.—Savings' club, deposits during the year, £151. 9s. 3d.—Boys' Night School: 94 scholars. Drawing class continued regularly, but attendance small. The Mental Improvement Society has reading room, several classes, the use of the library, and several discussion meetings. The Dramatic Recitation class has been regularly held. A large number of the "Christian Freeman," "Sunday School Penny Magazine," and Unitarian Herald have been sold in the school.—Girls' Sunday-school: 152 scholars, sixteen teachers.—Girls' Night School: 85 scholars, six teachers. The sewing class, two teachers. Prizes were awarded to twenty-nine girls in the Sunday-school, and seven in the night school. Girls' Library, ninety-four volumes. Girls' savings' club, deposits £28. 0s. 4d.

Day School.—The day school is a mixed school, and was opened in January last. It has been conducted very efficiently by Miss Marsh. Number of scholars, 88.

Mission Work.—The Sunday and Wednesday evening services have been regularly held and well attended. A large number of tracts and handbills have been distributed. The penny entertainments were held for twenty-eight nights, and produced a net profit of £20. The treasurer's account showed: General fund, receipts, £86. 6s. 7d.; balance in hand, £5. 10s. 7d. Building fund, receipts, £5. 1s. 4d.; balance in hand, £23. 19s. 11d. Day school fund: receipts, £27. 12s. 4d.; balance in hand, £13. 1s. 11d. All debts are paid as soon as incurred, so that beyond the mortgage, the society is free from liability.

After the reading of the report, the meeting was addressed by the Revs. H. W. Crosskey, B. Wright, and E. Madeley; Messrs. J. R. Mott, F. Summers, J. Marsh, and other friends. Samuel Thornton, Esq., J.P., Messrs. J. Allday, J. Cooper, and other friends were also present. A hope was expressed that means would be found during the coming year to erect the intended chapel or meeting-house on the adjoining land.

DUKINFIELD: PRESENTATION TO THE REV. JOHN PAGE HOPPS.—A meeting of a very interesting character was held at the Old Chapel Schools on Wednesday evening, the 8th inst., at which nearly forty young women belonging to Mr. Hopps' Sunday afternoon class presented their teacher with an exceedingly beautiful album containing their portraits, and a gracefully designed and painted frontispiece containing the following inscription:—"The Dukinfeld Old Chapel Sunday School. Presented to the Rev. John Page Hopps by the members of his Sunday afternoon class, as a token of their gratitude and love. September 8, 1869." The presentation was made by Miss Ingham in a few touching words which described the gift as a token of true "gratitude and love." Mr. Hopps replied in very few words. This gift, he said, would be as dear to him as anything he might ever receive. It was suggestive of nothing but peace and harmony. He was only afraid he did not deserve it; but it would, nevertheless, remind him of a work that had been very dear to him. In conclusion, he assured them that his decision to go to Scotland was not caused by any discomfort he felt here. His reasons he had not talked much of. When a man has to do a duty; it is his business to do it and not talk about it. This concluded the business of the meeting; and the remainder of a very pleasant evening was spent in friendly conversation.

ELLAND: RE-OPENING OF CHRIST'S CHAPEL.—The Elland Unitarian Chapel having been put in thorough repair, and painted, was re-opened on Sunday, September 5, when two sermons were preached by the Rev. J. Thomas, B.A., of Huddersfield, and the Rev. T. H. Smith, of Halifax. On Saturday, the 11th, the annual meeting of the congregation was held. Several visitors from Halifax and Dewsbury were present. After tea, George Buckton, Esq., of Leeds, presided over the public meeting, which was held in the chapel. On taking the chair, he gave a brief history of the Presbyterian cause in Elland, from the time when Oliver Heywood preached in the Old Chapel and in the old Halls of the neighbourhood, and closed a very powerful address by declaring that "Unitarianism is the religion of Christ, freed from the traditions of men." The secretary's report was next read, which showed considerable revival of activity since the settlement of the Rev. John Ellis, the present minister, who found the cause in Elland very low—without union, Sunday school, choir, organist, or chapel committee, and with much prejudice against it. It is now in a very different and more hopeful state. Addresses were afterwards given by the Revs. T. H. Smith and C. Howe, and others.—On Sunday, the 12th, the Rev. John Ellis preached to very attentive congregations on the history of Nonconformity and the Brave Two Thousand.

LIVERPOOL: BEAUFORT-STREET MISSION.—The first exhibition of plants in connection with the Window Gardening Society, took place on September 3rd, in the Mission Room. Mr. White, gardener to Thomas Avison, Esq., to whose kindness the society owes much, adjudged five money prizes to those whose plants were in the most thriving condition. The exhibition was very successful; and it is hoped the society will do much to encourage innocent and refined tastes among the poor in their homes.—On the same evening, the boys and girls of the Evening Schools presented a handsome inkindness to Mr. Henry Hawkes, who has been indefatigable during the last few years in promoting their improvement. On Monday the 6th, the teachers of the Beaufort-street Schools, with a few friends, numbering twenty-four, made an excursion to Hawarden Castle, near Chester.

WHAT THE CHURCHES ARE DOING.

A Roman Catholic chapel is being constructed in the Palace of Beylerbé, Constantinople, for the use of the Empress Eugénie during her visit.

The works at St. Peter's for the reception of the Council in December have nearly reached completion. The Papal throne stands at the end of the transept, the altar of the Council in the centre, the stalls for the Fathers being grouped around in seven rows. The whole space will be shut in by a curtain, which can be drawn aside so that the assembled multitudes may behold the grand scene. The stenographers chosen from the different nations, so that they may not stumble over any foreign—say British—Latin, are rapidly mastering their craft under one of the most experienced teachers. Seven commissions, each presided over by a Cardinal, are pushing on the work, and the Pope receives a daily report of their progress. A special commission, composed of high dignitaries, are appointed quartermasters to find lodgings for the guests. The inaugural sermon, it is added, is already weighing on the mind of Padre Luigi da Trento, the Archbishop of Iconum, the Apostolic preacher of the Vatican.

In many, if not most cases, the cost of the keep of the various Roman Catholic bishops at Rome during the sitting of the Council is being defrayed by collections among the faithful, and the Marquis of Bute has taken a palace there, in order to keep open house at the time.

Two subjects are at present engaging the attention of the Presbyterians of Ulster—the raising of a Sustentation fund, to take the place of the Regium Donum, and the resolutions adopted by the Roman Catholic bishops recently at Maynooth. Meetings on the former matter are being held in various presbyteries. It is reckoned that on January 1st, 1871, when the Disestablishment Act comes into operation, there will be about 550 ministers in receipt of the State grant. Each would be entitled to an annuity of £69, making altogether £37,950 a year. To enjoy this pay in permanence the Presbyterian body must commute the life-interests of the present ministers; and the amount thus realised would be not quite £650,000. If the interest on this is reckoned at £25,000, there would still be £12,000 needed to pay each minister his full annuity, and the question is how this shall be raised. On the other matter, a committee is preparing a statement in reply to Cardinal Cullen and his colleagues, which is to be the case of the Presbyterian body against denominational education.

The Bishop of Exeter has at last, having reached his 92nd year, quitted the stage on which he had long played a prominent, if not always a very attractive, part. The son of a brickmaker at Bridgewater, who was afterwards the landlord of the Bell Inn, at Gloucester, in which Whitfield was born, young Phillpotts was educated in the College School of that city, and there at the early age of thirteen won an Oxford scholarship. From that time forward he may truly be said to have fought his way to distinction, nearly always setting himself in determined opposition to liberal measures, whether in Church or State, and taking the unpopular side of every question which has latterly divided the British people. Some idea of his pugnacity may be formed from the simple fact which was mentioned by his eldest son, Archdeacon Phillpotts, at the late Visitation Court at Exeter, that he had spent, out of his own pocket, between £20,000 and £30,000 in litigation to preserve what appeared to him law and order in the Church. The Daily News says of him,—that he was more of a lawyer than a pastor, more of a politician than a priest. He was a controversialist by nature, and it was by controversy he made his way. To literature, to theology, to homiletics, to criticism, he has contributed nothing. He never wrote anything larger than a pamphlet, but his pamphleteering energy was so vast that the mere titles of his works fill, it is said, some sixteen pages of the British Museum Catalogue. He was made Bishop of Exeter solely for political purposes, and he was in consequence the most political of the bishops. But he was a man who had in him the guarantee of eminence. Had he been a lawyer the highest prizes of the profession might have been within his reach. The Duke of Wellington, not nature, made him a bishop; his proper, natural place was probably nearer to the Woolsack. It might have been happier for the Church had he turned his great powers in the direction of a legal career. As it is, he leaves on record the history of a long and vigorous administration which has not strengthened the Church in the great diocese he governed, which is marked by a succession of disastrous controversies, and which in the long pause which preceded his final resignation of his office has closed a period of vigorous rule by an illustrious proof how little administration a diocese needs.

Mr. Thomas Cooke Trench, a magistrate of the county of Kildare, has written to the Evening Mail to "dedicate a sum of £3,000 to the future service of the Irish Church." "We have too much just now," he says, "of the laity on the one hand withholding their subscriptions till they see whether the clergy are going to commute, and the clergy, on the other hand, hesitating to commute lest there should be a failure in those gifts on the part of the Churchmen at large which alone can render commutation of profit to the Church. I would humbly suggest to both whether that object would not be better attained by striving to excite one another to emulation than by each endeavouring to push the other into the forefront by hanging back till they see what the other will do."

Last week the foundation-stones of the first Armenian Church in England were laid in Clarence-street, Chorlton-upon-Medlock, Manchester, by the Rev. H. Giroyan. The stones, 16 in number, had been blessed on the previous Sunday. Each stone is dedicated to one of the apostles and fathers of the church, and has its special place assigned, according to the Armenian rubric, in the foundations. An acolyte carried the stones, which are about 2in. long, in a bag, each one folded in a white linen cloth, with the saint's name inscribed upon it. Small holes were cut in the foundation to receive the stones, which were deposited by Mr. Manouk Capamayum and Mr. B. Babo at each corner. During the ceremony the officiating priest, who wore a magnificent blue cope, richly trimmed with gold fringe, held in his hand a gold cross, and read from a richly-bound missal the psalms and prayers arranged for the service.

According to the John Bull, the S. P. C. K., at its next meeting in November, will be asked to make a grant of £1,000 to the funds of the Inverness Cathedral, where there were such High-church doings the other day.

A charge of insubordination of an unusual kind was brought against a pauper at the meeting of the Hertford board of guardians on Saturday. The master of the workhouse complained that one of the inmates—an elderly man named Bouchier, whose father was formerly rector of a parish in the Hertford union—persistently refused to be present at the reading of morning prayers. On Monday, when the master entered the hall for the purpose of reading prayers, Bouchier got up from his seat and left. On being afterwards expostulated with, he said, "I can't sit there while such a man as you reads the prayers. You are not a Christian, and I can't kneel with you at the throne of grace." The same conduct had been repeated throughout the week. The master said that on Tuesday and Thursday he told Bouchier that he desired him to be present while prayers were read, and that his answer was, "I will not obey your orders." On Bouchier being called into the board-room this statement was repeated to him, and he said it was quite correct. He was ready to obey the orders of the master in all secular matters, but no power in Christendom should make him kneel down at the throne of grace, under circumstances which to his mind made it a mockery and a profanity to do so. A discussion took place, and one guardian was of opinion that as the pauper had declared himself to be a Baptist on entering the house, he could not be compelled to attend the reading of the Church prayers, but others thought that as he had not based his defence on this ground, he could not avail himself of it. Bouchier was subsequently told what the consequences would be if he did not conform to the rules of the house, but he replied that he had made up his mind, and that, let what might happen, he would not attend prayers. A summons having been taken out against him, he was brought before the borough magistrates, and fined 8s. or one month, but was allowed a fortnight to pay.

We mentioned two or three months since the establishment in Switzerland, at Neuchâtel, of an organ of free thought, under the name of L'Emancipation; we have now the pleasure of announcing that a similar organ has been started at Milan, entitled La Riforma del Secolo, xix., which, judging from the number that has been sent us, promises to be of essential service to the cause of liberal Christianity in Italy. The editor, Signor Bracciforti, asks, "Why should it not be reserved for us Italians to found the true Catholic Church, which shall gather together all sincere worshippers of the Father, and all men of good will? Is not this the want of our time; above all in Italy, now that the voice of the Vatican threatens to rekindle religious hatred, uttering fresh maledictions in the name of the God who is love?" The editor rejoices in stating that he has obtained the valuable assistance of Advocate Sbarbaro, Professor of Philosophy and Political Economy in the University of Modena, who, in a letter addressed to the Anti-Council, to which he had been invited, frankly avows his firm adherence to the doctrines of Unitarianism, which in substance, he says, was the faith of Jesus Christ and the first Christians, and had such "glorious interpreters in our Socini," and was the belief of Newton, Locke, Milton, Clarke, and of the great religious lights of England belonging to the school of the Latitudinarians; and in our own day the Unitarianism of America sends us no ordinary splendour of moral wisdom, of active benevolence, and of devout goodness, embodying itself in Channing—one of the most rare and illustrious examples of ennobled human nature that our age has known. We heartily wish success to the Reform, and shall watch its course with interest.

A memorial to Mr. Gladstone is in course of signature in the diocese of Exeter urging the division of the diocese and the restoration of the bishopric of Cornwall. The memorialists state that in making this request it is not their wish to see any increase in the number of bishops in the House of Lords.

WHAT IS SAYING ON CHURCH MATTERS.

The Pall Mall Gazette's correspondent at Rome writes:

"I have obtained from an official source some very precise information as to the attitude assumed by the various sections of the Catholic episcopate in respect to the Council. The Holy See counts on the complete adhesion of the Italian and American bishops. The French episcopate will form three parties, namely, the Ultramontanes, the Gallicans (led by the Archbishop of Paris), and the Liberals (headed by the Bishop of Orleans). The German bishops will be favourable to the Court of Rome on some questions, but will vehemently oppose it on others, particularly those of a political and social character. The Hungarian bishops will be almost wholly in opposition; and the same spirit is evinced by the bishops of Portugal; while the Spanish episcopate, with one or two exceptions, is entirely devoted to the Holy See. Altogether the Vatican is dissatisfied. It is secure of a majority; but this will, in some cases, be very narrow; and there is reason to believe that the political questions will be warmly, if not passionately, discussed."

The Correspondence de Rome says:

"The events which are now unfolding in Europe justify grievously, and in a manner every day more startling, the necessity of the Council. It seems to be a blunder on the part of the Devil to persist in proving, in the sight of everybody, that Pius IX. has obeyed solely the inspirations of the Holy Spirit. The war against the Church, the Papacy, and monastic orders is acquiring a Satanic reduplication. In Austria, petitions and meetings are multiplying to demand the 'abolition of all convents as useless to Christian religion and compromising the existence of the State.' These petitions and meetings are supported by acts of revolting brutality, and the drama of the Carmelite of Cracow, imagined for the wants of the revolutionary cause, justifies everything. In Prussia, the Dominican convent, recently established at Moabit, near Berlin, has been taken by assault and sacked. Ferocious passions excite the Protestants, whose fanaticism is alarmed at the progress of the Catholic religion. In Bavaria even simple associations of students in honour of the Holy Virgin are sued and dissolved. All Germany is under the incubus of a press full of impiety, hatred, lies and calumnies, depending on Judaism and sect. In truth, it comprises men of talent who render the struggle more arduous for Catholics. In Spain, after the demolition of churches and the expulsion of monks and nuns, have come the arrest and imprisonment of all orders of the clergy, regular or secular. The position of the bishops, whose courage is equal to their learning, becomes every day more redoubtable, and only a political.

cataclysm can restore to them the holy liberty of their ministry." The writer goes into more lengthy details of the oppression of Catholics in Poland and Lithuania—such as the imprisonment of priests, the confiscation of parish property, the police surveillance of the clergy, the preventive censorship of discourses and chants to be delivered or sung in churches, the exclusive use of the Russian language in baptisms, marriages, and interments, the tax of 10 roubles on a Catholic baptism, but the premium of 20 roubles on the baptism of a Catholic-born child by a Russian pope, the publication of a list of prohibited Polish saints not to be honoured or even named by the Catholic clergy, and, finally, the suppression of a great number of Catholic churches and chapels. After enumerating these causes of complaint, the article concludes with the following inferences: "When such crimes are accomplished in the name of the great principles of universal toleration, of religious liberty, the liberty of creed, conscience, thought, association—in a word, of all liberties, it is time at last for the Church to confound impostors, for the truth to disengage itself from all these falsehoods, and for the Ecumenical Council to protest in the name of the world against this oppression of the human soul, and these unheard-of efforts to drive God away from humanity, and with Him justice and real right and liberty. The necessity of the Council is thus demonstrated a priori by those very persons who repel it."

A grave question is solemnly discussed by the Methodist Recorder—whether local preachers are justified in using the velocipede on Sundays. On the whole the Recorder is not prepared to condemn the new machine being so used. It is better to walk than ride, if the distance will permit; but it is better to ride a velocipede than a horse. But it is asked, "Where will the innovation end? Perhaps we shall have a 'Local Preachers' Bicycle Fund,' with a yearly collection." It would only be in keeping with this revolutionary age.

Dean Alford, having been applied to, like all the other deans, by the two archbishops for suggestions of improvement in cathedral management, has, "by permission," published his answer in the Contemporary Review. He gives it generally as his opinion that the revenues "could hardly be worse managed" than they now are for the needs of the Church; that they "are not merely useless in their present appropriation, but, for Church purposes, mischievous, fostering a spirit which it is desirable to discourage, and ensuring for improvement and activity hindrance instead of help." "Members of chapters," he says, "have generally no common bond except the conservation of their incomes and rights;" and this generally becomes in practice "systematic caution against any precedents being set for regular participation in Church work beyond that required of them by their statutes, and constant endeavour to prevent the cathedral from being employed for other than statutable purposes." At Canterbury there are six canons, each of £1,000 a year; two of them are attached to the archdeaconries of Canterbury and Maidstone; the other four Dean Alford would suppress as the present canons die off, and save £4,000 a year for the work of the Church. In the non-capitular body the dean attaches much importance to getting rid of the title of "honorary canons." Difference of ranks among the clergy he finds to be a practical evil. "One of the chief troubles," he says, "in the working of a cathedral body arises from the continual petty squabbles about etiquette and precedence arising from acknowledged or presumed difference of rank in office;" and there is something in the word "honorary" which makes it apparently thought anything but honourable by the canons whom it concerns. The dean especially objects to that part of the cathedral system which allows canons to hold benefices elsewhere, and requires of them a residence of only two or three months at the cathedral. "The very caricature of all that is bad in the system is found in those cases where there is but one prebendal house, and the canons come and go throughout the year, an arrangement so absurd that it would hardly be credited if not known to exist. I have heard the dean of one such cathedral confess that he would be infinitely better off if reduced to two canons, and these with homes on the spot, than at present with his four canons who never meet, and his interregna of four weeks in each year, while one is going out and another coming in."

Sir George Bowyer, in a note to the Times, gives an instance of the late Bishop of Exeter's sagacity. He says:

"Before I became a Roman Catholic he used frequently to consult me on matters of canon law, &c. In one of our conferences, more than twenty years ago, he used these words, 'The Irish Church must go. It is doomed, and nothing can save it; and if we don't keep clear of it we shall go too.' He has just lived long enough to see his prophecy fulfilled."

A Colonial clergyman, in a letter printed in the Guardian, in answer to the question whether the Church of England is a decaying Church, gives but a disheartening response. He says:

"Its extension in the colonies, and the church-building spirit at home, are supposed to represent the flourishing estate of the Church. But are they anything more than outward works, and do they carry with them an inner life? I fear we must admit that as England as a nation has entirely failed in reproducing her institutions in her colonies, and has simply planted so many republics, held to the monarchy by a thread, but democratic to the very heart's core, and only democratic; so the Church of England is among her people everywhere a sober, rational form of religion in a State dress, but is nowhere believed to be a part of the Catholic Church. This makes our position so little tolerable when compared with the Roman Catholics. In spite of all their errors they certainly believe, as a body, what the New Testament teaches, and I fear we do not; I mean in regard to the Church. Their respect for their clergy, their contributions, their earnestness in attendance, their unity, far exceed anything that we know of; and our via media seems to be simply falling away from both. We have neither the authority of the Papal system nor the rough vigour of the sects; and our system seems adapted to refined, educated gentlemen, not to the rough, hard subjects one daily meets with in the world. I fear we are decaying, and shall decay—e.g., look at Ireland. I hold with Gladstone in the matter of the disestablishment; yet where is the sign of vigorous Church life in the body?—where is there any sign but that of Protestant antagonism, even in so able a man as Archbishop Trench, of whom I hoped better things? Look at the English Church. When Lord Lyttelton brings in his bill, is not a seat in the House of Lords, a palace, and £5,000 a year, apparently dearer to them all than the extension of the Episcopate and the adequate provision of spiritual gifts for the needs of the vast body of professing Churchmen? Those speeches might make thousands Radicals, and might well prepare men's minds for their removal from the House of Peers. But will disestablishment or disconnection from the State enable the Church of England or of Ireland to take a higher view of its own position? Gladstone thinks it will. I hope it may; but I am not sanguine, as the Church notion seems eradicated from people's minds in general."

Pius the Ninth has at last vouchsafed a reply to Dr. Cumming, though a semi-contemptuous one, through "our Venerable Brother Henry Edward, Archbishop of Westminster." He has "seen from the newspapers that Dr. Cumming of Scotland" had written first to the Archbishop, and then to himself, wishing to know whether leave would be given at the approaching Council to those who dissent from the Catholic Church to put forward arguments in support of their opinions. The answer is only what the Doctor himself, with his knowledge of that church, must have looked for, and we can but think, hoped for. He could not really expect that he would be allowed to affront Papal infallibility with his poor fallibility. This would have been to surrender the foundation principle on which Romanism rests. Of course it "cannot permit errors which it has carefully considered, judged, and condemned to be again brought into discussion." His Holiness, in his letter of September 13, 1868, to Protestants and other non-Catholics, "signified that the primacy, which was conferred upon Peter and his successors by the Founder of the Church, is placed beyond the hazard of disputation. This, indeed, is the hinge upon which the whole question between Catholics and all who dissent from them turns." Discussion, therefore, is plainly out of the question; and all that remains for the Doctor, and others in error with him, is "to avail themselves of the opportunity afforded by this Council" to "satisfy the wants of their souls by withdrawing them from a state in which they cannot be sure of their salvation." The plain lesson of the letter for Protestants is that Rome is unchanged and unchangeable, and that for it to condescend to reason would be at once abandoning the ground on which it stands, and that all such works as Dr. Pusey's "Eirenicon" are simply love's labour lost.

Referring to the letters which recently passed between Dr. Cumming and Dr. Manning respecting the Council, the Guardian suggests that after all neither of them may have meant all that they said. Dr. Cumming has his jest sometimes; and it may be a kindly verdict on his late correspondence to say that he was only "in admirable fooling" when he indited it. The archbishop, like a wise man, may have thought it better to cap the joke than to come to blows, where nothing was to be gained by the fight.

A document has just made its appearance in the Paris papers which cannot but have a startling effect on the French Catholic world. It is a letter addressed by the eloquent preacher Father Hyacinthe to the General of the barefooted Carmelites at Rome, tendering his resignation as Superior of the order in Paris. He states that he is the victim of a powerful party at Rome, and accuses the general of blaming what he had hitherto approved, adding, "You exact that I should speak a certain language, or that I should hold my peace, which is to hinder me from expressing what my conscience dictates." He refuses to play the rôle which the general wishes to impose on him, and says, "I leave the convent which I inhabit, which under present circumstances has become a prison for the soul. In acting thus I am not unfaithful to my vows; I promised monastic obedience, but within the limits of honesty and my conscience, of the dignity of my person and my ministry." He then goes on to remark that the Church is passing through a dangerous crisis, as for the first time for 300 years a Council has been deemed necessary, and that the moment is ill chosen for gagging a preacher of the gospel. This courageous letter will be hailed with intense satisfaction by the Liberal party in France and other parts of the Continent.

The Church News, announcing that the Premier attended service in the parish church, or, as it calls it, the "Presbyterian place of worship," at Crathie, not finding sufficient words of its own to comment on the awful profanity, gasps out a text from the Old Testament which Mr. Gladstone, we presume, is supposed to offer up as a personal supplication for pardon. "In this thing the Lord pardon thy servant, that when my master goeth into the house of Rimmon to worship there, and he leaneth on my hand, and I bow down myself in the house of Rimmon; when I bow down myself in the house of Rimmon, the Lord pardon thy servant in this thing." As the Daily News observes, "The piety, charity, and loyalty of this application of Scripture, and its good taste and good feeling, cannot be too much admired. Mr. Gladstone, recovering from his illness, is Naaman, the parish church of Crathie is the house of Rimmon, while Her Majesty stands for the heathen King of Syria, who brings his servant into the unholy place. The indecency of the parallel nearly equals its enormous silliness."

Mr. Punch tells us that Mrs. Malaprop, who has read that the bishops attending the Pope's great Council at Rome are to receive an allowance, "varying between 6s. 8d. and 10s. a day," says that she now understands why it is called the "Economic" Council. She is thankful to think (Mrs. M. is an exemplary member of the Established Church) that our bishops are better paid.

Zadkiel, in his prophecies for next year, when he comes to October, informs us: "This month will witness some remarkable squabbles among Churchmen, in which the spirit of Christian charity will play a very subordinate part." It needs no seer to tell us that.

At a Leeds temperance meeting on Tuesday, Archdeacon Sandford stated that the Archbishop of Canterbury, by pondering the report of the Committee of Convocation, on intemperance, has been brought to agree with him on the subject. From some clergymen, however, he had received anything but help. One wrote to say that he did not think the question was one with which the clergy had anything to do. Another, a canon of the Church receiving £1,000 a year for eating white soup and doing nothing, wrote that he had no time even to give the addresses of the clergy in his rural deanery. A third, the nephew of an Irish archbishop, thought that his clergy were better employed in their parochial duties than in answering the inquiries. Another enclosed them in an envelope addressed to the "Radical Archdeacon of Coventry," and declined to have any communication with him at all. He had, however, gone on with these inquiries until he had secured the sympathy of the most influential members of the English Church, and when he had the Archbishop of Canterbury to back him he did not very much care what treatment he received at the hands of the smaller fry. But he did tremble at times for the future of the Establishment, if its clergy and members did not learn wisdom in time, and see that its real strength and stability was not in the favour of princes, and in the patronage of the wealthy and the great, but in the affections and esteem of the English people.

THE ASSUMPTION OF THE VIRGIN MARY.

It seems now pretty well understood among those who are in the secrets of the Romish Church that the approaching Ecumenical Council is not only to decree the personal infallibility of the Pope, but to supplement the dogma of the Immaculate Conception by an edict rendering it indispensable to salvation to believe that the body of Mary was, within a short time after her death, taken up miraculously into heaven. As a groundwork for any such doctrine, it need hardly be said the Scriptures afford not a hint. The story, which has grown up during the development of Mariolatry, out of the fancies and so-called "revelations" of visionaries, is by no means precise and consistent in its details, but its general features are thus given by the English Independent:

"After the ascension of our Saviour, Mary remained on earth, resolving the doubts and encouraging the faith of the disciples. At length the angel Gabriel was sent to her with the announcement—'My Lady and my Queen, God has heard thy holy sighs; He has sent me to tell thee to prepare to leave this earth, because He wishes to see thee with Himself in paradise. Come, then, to take possession of thy kingdom, for I and all the holy citizens of heaven expect and desire thee.' Mary communicated the message to St. John, and proceeded to take her leave of the holy places, visits to which on a former occasion had so excited the anger of the Jews that they threatened to burn her body after death. The apostles who were in different parts of the world received a simultaneous announcement of the approaching event, and were miraculously brought together, those who were dead being recalled from the grave for the purpose. Adam, Eve, the Patriarchs, David, and crowds of angels were among her visitors, and at length Jesus appeared with the sign of the cross in his hand; and, giving to Mary the viaticum, said, 'Take, O my mother, from my hands that same body which thou hast given me.' Mary then commended her soul and body to the protection of her Son, whose favour she invoked for the disciples, upon which the Saviour replied, 'Everything thou hast said to me, Mary, I will do to please thee; and I will show mercy to every one who calls upon thy name.' Celestial music was then heard in the room, a brilliant light seen, and John, laying his hands upon her eyes, affectionately closed them. Of what followed we have very varied accounts. In an Ethiopic 'Hymn of the Sanctification of the Body of our Lady Mary,' we read—

'When the mother of God wept and was in pain
And when she died like all men,
John beheld her and covered her face with a robe.
Then as she lay at rest
Her Son came and clothed her with royal raiment,
And now she reigns in glory:
The moon and the stars are beneath her feet.
Halleluah.'

"A Syriac version of the departure is, 'Our Lord commanded them to place the Blessed One in a chariot of light, and the twelve apostles bore it as it went to the Paradise of Eden.' St. Alphonsus Liguori says, 'Jesus stretches forth his hand to her, and the Blessed Mother is raised in the air; she passes the clouds and the spheres.' Marie d'Agreda, who in the seventeenth century wrote the Virgin's biography as revealed to her in a vision, states that Mary was co-existent with the creation of the world, that she went with Christ to heaven, but returned to render service to the Church, that she made her will in Jerusalem, died and was buried, and on the third day rose again and went to heaven for the second time. Another version is, that St. Thomas having arrived three days after the other apostles, was too late to witness her obsequies, but desiring again to look upon the Virgin's face, the gravestone was removed, when nothing was found but the grave-clothes, a sweet odour of lilies and roses, indicating that the body had been taken up to heaven. Another legend states that the intimation of this event having occurred was made to the apostles by a sudden apparition of the Virgin three days after the death, or 'sleeping,' as it is frequently named. Mary having arrived in the celestial regions, the angels crowded to salute her, 'and the great Queen thanked them all for the assistance they had given her on earth, but particularly the archangel Gabriel, who, in coming to announce to her that she had been made mother of God, was the happy herald of all her glories.' Liguori, in his 'Glories of Mary,' thus describes the final honour bestowed upon her—'The Father crowns her with a participation of His power, the Son with a participation of his wisdom, and the Holy Ghost with a participation of his love. Placing her throne at the right hand of Jesus Christ, the three Divine Persons proclaim her universal Queen of Heaven and Earth, and command the angels and all creatures to acknowledge her as their Queen, and to serve and obey her as their Queen.' Bishop Ullathorne, upon this subject, says: 'The ascending scale of sanctities is completed. The mystical ladder ascends from the earth in Jacob's vision, and the angels ascend and descend upon it, and God Himself is leaning on it, and on its topmost degree, above the ascent of every other created sanctity, is placed the Immaculate Mother of God. The interval between the thrones of the saints and the throne of Jesus is filled up.' This, then, is the legend upon which the new dogma of the Corporeal Assumption is to be based, and that nothing may be wanting to the exaltation of Mary, the Arch-bishop of Trani has urged the Pope to declare the Virgin to be 'co-redemptrix,' and the 'complement of the Holy Trinity' (trinitatis complementum)."

Such are the sort of silly fables which the gathered priests at Rome are about to declare, in solemn conclave, are dictated by the Holy Spirit, and to be received on pain of everlasting damnation. Well, the tighter they stretch the chain the better; the sooner we may hope it will crack completely in twain.

OUR BLACKLEY CHAPEL AND ITS HISTORY.

THIS chapel, the first place of worship erected in Blackley by separatists from the Communion of the Established Church, was, no doubt, like many others in this district, built in what was then a situation removed from the public gaze; for although the Act of Toleration, passed in 1688, legalised the erection of dissenting chapels, their occupants were still regarded with a considerable degree of hostility.

Before the existence of any settled place of worship a congregation had assembled, worshipping with such secrecy as the stringent laws enacted against Dissenters at that time rendered needful, a Mrs. Travis receiving the ministers at her house: and it is recorded that June 30th, 1682, Oliver Heywood preached here "to a full company at Widow Travis's house."

The present chapel dates from the year 1697, when William Rowlinson made over to certain trustees the land comprising the site of the chapel, the graveyard, and the two adjoining cottages, together with "the said structure or meeting-house," for the term of 999 years, they paying therefor an annual rent of twopence, "if the same be demanded."

As showing the uncertainty which still existed as to the position of Dissenters, one of the provisions of the lease recites, "That if at any time hereafter, during the term hereby granted, there shall happen any change of Government whereby the said dissenting ministers shall be restrained of their liberty and free exercise of their worship," that then the building shall be used for a school, and failing either chapel or school, the whole to revert to William Rowlinson or his representatives.

That this feeling of uncertainty was not without cause, is evidenced by the fact that in June, 1715, a lawless mob visited Blackley and destroyed the chapel, passing onward the next day to Failsworth and Monton, with a like result to the chapels there.

It is needless to go through the list of ministers (which is still extant) who have officiated at Blackley Chapel; suffice it to say that several of them were men of considerable literary distinction.

At one time many of the principal families of the neighbourhood attended this chapel, among whom were the Taylors of Moston, Bayleys of Crumpsall House, and Joneses of Greenhill; and it may not be out of place to remark that here the late Mr. Lewis Loyd, then a young Unitarian minister, met his future wife, Miss Jones, and, in connection with her brothers, afterwards established the great banking-house of Jones, Loyd, and Co. The only issue of that marriage was Samuel Jones Loyd, now Lord Overstone.

There is an endowment of £25 a year attached to the chapel arising from land let on a lease, of which nearly sixty years are unexpired; and a further sum of £6 annually, being the interest of a bequest under the will of the late Thomas Johnson, of Smedley.

Until within the last ten or twelve years the congregation had dwindled to a low ebb. About that time the occasional preaching of the Rev. J. C. Street excited attention, and his endeavours in resuscitating the congregation and establishing a Sunday-school were very successful. The careful and assiduous earnestness of the Rev. Adam Rushton made still further advances. A commodious school-room was built by subscription of the congregation and many friends; the chapel was re-pewed and thoroughly beautified at the sole expense of one good friend, and, Mr. Rushton having removed to Hindley, the newly-appointed minister the Rev. Joseph Freeston, sees before him a good congregation composed principally of the better class of working people, respected and influential in their position. Among these are many young men and women whose future the elder members regard with much interest, looking to them to continue and carry forward the good work which has been and still is doing in Blackley.

[We are indebted for the early historical portion of this notice to the Rev. John Booker's "History of the Chapelry of Blackley."]

FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 24, 1869.

ADMISSION TO OUR CONGREGATIONS.

A CORRESPONDENT has brought before us a subject, the interest and importance of which has probably been felt by many of our readers. A week or two ago he wrote to us:

"Do you think our present mode of admitting members to church fellowship, with its various privileges and offices, the best that could be adopted for the promotion of religious life? I believe in most congregations paying for a sitting constitutes a member, and entitles him to fill any office. Now, do you think it well to hear a man avow his disbelief in God, hear a man swear, see a man rambling the streets drunk, and have him pointed out as a member of the chapel committee, a chapel-warden, or superintendent of the Sunday-school? Do you, or do you not, think that this affects our religious life as a church?"

Our correspondent confounds together two very different things, but the confusion is of a kind which very frequently prevails on this matter. He speaks as if eligibility to an office must involve being elected to it; so that the having disreputable people in our congregations involved the world being able to point with scorn at the church for putting them in office. But in reality the two things are entirely distinct, and we believe that the public clearly understand the distinction. The way in which the sense of the incongruity is commonly uttered, itself shows the distinction. Let it be said of a man found to be an immoral character, "Why, he is a member of such and such a congregation," and the remark will be—"the more shame for him." Let it be said, "they chose him as a chapel-warden last week," and the remark would be—and deservedly—"the more shame for them." This latter condemnation is all that we ought to shun, and to do so needs no new apparatus for straining out either theological gnats or moral camels, but merely greater conscientiousness in choosing the worthiest men to our congregational posts of honour. That unworthy men do occasionally get chosen to such posts is undoubtedly true for our own church as for all others, though we think such illustrations as our correspondent proposes are too rare and extreme to be worth founding any argument upon; but the cause is to be sought deeper down than in the fact of such men being able to join the congregation on the same footing as the other attendants of the chapel. It lies in a low tone of feeling on such subjects among the congregation, a tone which would be just as lax in admitting to membership as in electing to office.

We believe that the experience of all attempts to set up a formal, selected church within a district from the members of the congregation, will be found practically to confirm these views. Certain it is that among those bodies which keep up the system of technical "church-membership," there is a growing dissatisfaction with it. They find that, like all other tests, it admits many of those whom it should keep out, and keeps out many whose place should evidently be within. Some men of high standing among the Independents and Baptists have publicly set themselves against the whole system, and even among the Wesleyans, though for a minister to say so would be treason, some of the lay correspondents of their papers shew that their rules of membership are a burden, only kept from becoming prohibitory to large numbers by their systematic infraction (as in the case of the vexed question of class-meetings) being winked at. The fact is that it is alike impossible to devise any formal conditions of inner church communion that will not fetter the spirit, and any uniform qualification for admission to it which would admit the right people and none else. Maintaining an inner society of select members is terribly apt to foster spiritual pride. It is not well to have the grades and stages of religious progress sharply defined. They cannot be so defined in reality, and all attempts to mark them out can only result in artificiality.

We are persuaded that the true solution of the difficulty lies, not in setting up barriers or tests at the circumferences of our church life, but in fostering a warmer and deeper spirit of religion at its centre. We would say—have that central life of the church fervent and active, and then let all draw as close to it, and associate as much with it, as they feel disposed. It was once said, with more wit than truth, that in our Unitarian congregations we have "not warmth enough to singe a sinner." What we want is more of that warmth, and then the more sinners come the better. With such true fire of earnestness at the heart of our services, if unworthy men come in, as God grant they ever may, they will be made better by coming, or else will by-and-by go away. If they are made better, by all means let them draw with us into the closest fellowship we have in our religious life. Such an esprit de corps will insensibly supply its own test. Birds of a feather flock together. Men utterly unworthy will not seek that innermost fellowship. They would feel it irksome and a restraint. But if left thus open many a one will quickly slip into its associations, and be thankful for them, feel helped by them, gradually rise to their higher level, who would never have sought them if any formal admission had been required.

DR. FRANCIS W. GIBSON.

THIS gentleman, whose death was announced in our columns a fortnight ago, was the son of the Rev. Robert Gibson, of Chideock, and brother of the Rev. R. H. Gibson, B.A., of Manchester. The Lancet has the following notice of him, which will be read with interest by his many friends in the south of England:

"Dr. Gibson was a distinguished pupil of University College, and a Graduate, with honours, in Arts and Medicine at the University of London. He filled for some years the offices of house surgeon to the Taunton and Somerset Hospital, and of resident surgeon at the Broadmoor Criminal Lunatic Asylum. At the close of 1867 he was chosen senior resident medical officer of the St. Pancras Parochial Infirmary. Here, as elsewhere, he devoted his best energies to the welfare of the poor committed to his care, and was the means of effecting many improvements. His zeal in the reformation of abuses did not tend to increase his popularity; nevertheless he persevered in doing his duty, per fas et nefas, regardless of consequences to himself. By-and-by the impure atmosphere of the place began to tell on his constitution and undermine his health. Then low fever supervened, and eventually symptoms of tubercular cachexia became manifest. Search was made in vain for the source of the sewage smells, but there they were, doing their usual work slowly, but surely. Dr. Gibson obtained a brief holiday, but hurried back to his post on hearing of the death of the matron, who was stated to have been herself poisoned by the contaminated air. He now became so weak and ill that his friends were alarmed for his life, and, under the advice of eminent physicians, he made preparations for an immediate voyage to Australia. The sailing of his ship was unfortunately delayed, but at last, having resigned his post at the Infirmary, he set off, under as comfortable circumstances as possible. But disease had gained the mastery, and he died on June 24th, hardly one week from his quitting the shores of England. The immediate decease was rather sudden and unexpected, following a fit of coughing. Thus perished, at the early age of thirty-three, a valuable public officer, and an honourable, conscientious, and talented member of the profession."

HENRY CRABB ROBINSON'S "DIARY."

XI.

1839, January 6th. "I read part of Gladstone's new book, on the connection between Church and State. He assumes a moral duty on the part of the Government to support what it deems the truth; but here a great difficulty is involved. What right has the Government to compel a minority either to concur in or support a Church in which it does not believe? The State, as such, has no organ by which to distinguish between spiritual truth and falsehood." To this, we imagine, Mr. Gladstone would now thoroughly agree.

On the 22nd of the same month, we have this on the same subject: "I am glad to find that neither he [Wordsworth] nor Dr. Arnold can accompany Gladstone in his Anglo-papistical pretensions. Indeed, of the two, the Doctor is less of a Churchman. I find that he considers the whole claim of apostolical succession as idle."

And in writing to his brother about the same time, he says of Gladstone's book: "It will delight the high-flying Anglo-papistical Oxford party, but only alienate still further the conscientious Dissenters and displease the Liberal Churchmen. Even Wordsworth says he cannot distinguish its principles from Romanism. Whilst G. expatiates with unction on the mystic character of the Church, he makes no attempt to explain what is the Church of England; though, to be candid, even Dr. Arnold is not able to make that clear to me."

October 7th, of the same year, the Diarist writes: "Mr. Clarkson gave me to read a little 'Essay on Baptism' he had written for his grandson. In this little tract he maintains, with great clearness, and at least to my perfect satisfaction, that Christ's commission to baptise was a commission to convert and make proselytes from other religions, and that it was not intended to baptise the children of Christians. Repentance is the condition of salvation; baptism a mere formal, and not an essential, condition. Without pretending to have an opinion on a question of history, ignorant as I am, I would merely say this, that there is nothing unreasonable in combining with a spiritual change a symbolic act; but it is most unreasonable to maintain that the effect of baptism partakes of the nature of galvanism."

Writing to his brother, July 17th, 1841, and referring to the death of a nephew, he says: "I often think of dear Tom's last weeks. The repose with which he looked forward to death, and the unselfishness of his feelings, add greatly to my esteem for his memory. During the day before yesterday at a clergyman's, I related some anecdotes of my nephew's last days, and ventured on the bold remark that I thought his conduct evinced a more truly Christian feeling than that diseased anxiety about the state of his soul which certain people represent as eminently religious. My host did not reprove, but echoed the remark; and he said the same day, 'If I found Calvinism in the Bible, it would prove, not that Calvinism is true, but that the Bible is false.'"

In 1842, Mr. Robinson saw a good deal of Mr. Faber, who afterwards, as might have been anticipated from the supremacy which he assigned to the Church, went over to Rome. Writing on December 30th, H. C. R. says: "Mr. Faber declared that without the Church the Scriptures would not suffice to convince him—he should be an unbeliever; and he declared Bibliolatry to be the worst of idolatries. By-the-by, it is curious to remark how both parties in the Church concur in offering an apology for the unbeliever. These Puseyites, or Faberites, must consider the infidels as better logicians than the Dissenters, who deny the Church and yet are Christians; and the Evangelicals must think the unbelievers better logicians than those who rest their faith on the Church, and according to whom the Scriptures are only a record of that which had been established, that is the Church itself."

Under January 5th, of the next year, we have this: "A walk with Wordsworth and Faber. Their conversation I was not competent altogether to follow. Faber attempted—but failed—to make clear to my mind the difference between transubstantiation, which he rejects, and consubstantiation, which he still more abominates" (holding the High Church doctrine of the Real Presence). "Wordsworth denied transubstantiation on grounds 'on which,' says Faber, 'I should deny the Trinity.' Wordsworth declared, in strong terms, his disbelief of eternal punishment; which Faber did not attempt to defend."

On the 29th of the same month follows this: "I have had a very pleasant chat with Mr. Faber, who, in spite of everything in his book, protests that he can never by any possibility become a member of the Church of Rome. He takes credit for having rescued a considerable number of persons standing on the brink of the precipice from tumbling down. But to introduce Popery into the Church of England is, I think, a much greater evil than joining the Church of Rome."

In a letter to H. C. R., dated August 25th, 1843, Mr. Quillinan, Wordsworth's son-in-law, a very liberal Roman Catholic, as we can testify, thus refers to Mr. Faber, then at Rome: "He got much among the cardinals, and seems all but to have been converted to the true faith. This between ourselves; but he has rather retrograded; the Devil pulled him back a step or two from the Pope, and he stands again on the old new ground, if a man can be said to stand on a quicksand. What say you who stand on the adamant rock of d—n, on the farther shore, the indisputable territory of His Satanic Majesty? There is a little Popery for you, to pay you off for your heretical irreverence towards the Infallible Pontiff?"

And, in reply to this, Mr. Robinson writes: "To speak again of Faber, and the like, I never feared that they would go over to the Church of Rome, but that they would do a much worse thing—bring over the Church of Rome, or rather the Papacy, into England's Church; import all its tyranny and its spirit of persecution, and, without the merit of consistency, claim the same prerogatives. The Archbishop of Dublin (Whately) said to a friend of mine, 'If I must have a Pope, I would rather have a Pope at Rome than at Oxford;' and I heartily join in this."

To these notices may be added the following, written about the same time: "The great points of High Church doctrine now urged with such vehemence are—the Power of the Keys given to the Episcopal body, and the exclusive power it possesses of bringing men within the pale of Christianity by the sacrament of baptism, and keeping them there by the administration of the sacrament. Even the Trinity, the Atonement, and Original Sin are, compared with those, pushed very much out of sight. Now, sad as such a state of religion is, which makes of Christianity a sort of animal magnetism, yet it is still, to my apprehension, less frightful than Calvinism; and I own I find much to admire, and even to assent to, in the sermons of Newman on the nature of belief, which Faber gave me. Newman, you know, is the real head of this party; hence Sydney Smith's joke, that the doctrine should be called 'Newmania!'"

PULPIT DYSPEPSIA.

BY ROBERT COLLYER.

PULPIT dyspepsia is a disease that attacks the minister first and then the congregation. The first symptoms of its presence are felt in the study. About the end of May the man goes to work in the old fashion he has followed all the year to study his sermon, and finds he has no appetite for the work. He can neither fall out with Calvin nor agree with Channing to get a start. Every text is a dead-letter. The hints and ideas, the seed corn of sermons, that thrilled his hand and warmed his heart when he jotted them down as they came to him, and that will be as good as fine gold again by-and-by, seem now to be all dry and adust together. He tries to think of some subject he has always thought he would love to preach about—nothing comes of that; some topic his people need to hear about—no better luck. All topics are alike, and all alike emptied of their interest, until the poor fellow cries, Woe is me, what shall I do?

The truth is, a preacher in this case is like a man who must eat, and cares nothing at all about his dinner, because he has no appetite. But, as the one must eat to keep the life in him, the other must preach, or his people think he must, to keep the life in his church. I think, however, it is as true as two and two make four that no man, no matter what may be his ability, can get any more inspiration and life out of a sermon than he puts into it. He puts very little in while this trouble is on him, because it is not in his nature. And so there is presently an appalling sight to be seen in the pews. Staunch, wide-awake people, that have listened like hungry boys for the dinner-bell ever since September, begin to nod. The good souls are dreadfully ashamed of it. They try the most comical contrivances to keep themselves awake first, and then, when that is hopeless, to seem as little asleep as possible. It is all of no use. The preacher sees them, and his heart sinks within him, and he would fain cry out, "Can ye not watch one hour?" Let us be frank about it. This may be one of those things in which nobody is to blame, except as we are to blame for any other sickness. The preacher has written too many sermons, and the people have heard too many for ten months past. They want a vacation all round. It will be medicine to their souls to get out of that and go into the silence. Augustus Staples used to say, that when he was settled in Lexington, and the warm weather came on, and his congregation of farmers would be mostly asleep by the time he got to secondly, instead of getting aggravated at the sight, a tender and kindly feeling would come over him as he thought how hard it must be to listen, how well they had listened, and how thoroughly they were enjoying their nap, until he almost feared to disturb them. Dean Ramsay tells a story of an old Scotch minister who one Sunday saw his whole congregation asleep, except an idiot in the gallery. He stopped, and his people all woke up, and then he cried, "Are ye not ashamed to be asleep as I preach the Word while that poor idiot is broad awake?" "Deed, minister," the fool replied, "if I hadna been an idiot I wad 'a been asleep too." It was a good reflection, no doubt. Wisdom that day was justified in her children. It was a weariness all round, and what is better for a weariness than a sleep? "I am asleep, but my heart wakes," one cries in the Song of Songs. So may many a good man say when he sleeps in church.

The cure for pulpit dyspepsia is the tonic of a good long vacation—a month, at least, and two if it can be managed. Churches should insist on their right to this as well as ministers. No more sermons now, they should say, until after dog days, or, at any rate, no more from the familiar and well-beloved source. Then nature and all her good angels will do the rest; and the Holy Spirit will come and brood over us under apple trees and in pine woods, on the mountains and by the sea, in green lanes and on wild downs, and the Lord's Christ will whisper again, Now sleep on and take your rest, for if we sleep we shall do well when it is misery to stay awake.

AMERICAN NOTES.

The many friends whom Dr. Bellows made in this country during his visit last year will, like ourselves, sympathise with him in his sorrow on the loss of his wife, who passed away, after a brief illness, at Northampton, on the 27th of August, in the fifty-second year of her age. The writer of an obituary in the Liberal Christian says: "Her constitution was frail, and she has suffered much for many years. It was hoped that her visit to Europe would result in her permanent benefit; but on Dr. Bellows' return from the Holy Land to Italy he found that she had lost rather than gained by her residence there, and their stay in England was shortened in consequence of her continued indisposition." In the winter she seemed comfortably well; and though she failed somewhat in the summer, it was not enough to excite alarm till within three or four days of her death. She knew the end had come, and it found her prepared and waiting. She was distinguished by her delicacy of perception and refinement of taste, and her judgment of most things was singularly accurate and trustworthy. The funeral service took place on the 30th ult., and was attended by a large number of sorrowing friends. After Dr. Farley had read appropriate passages of Scripture, and offered up a prayer full of sympathy and feeling, the Rev. Robert Collier gave a short, simple address, overflowing with tenderness and faith. He spoke of immortality as something not to be reasoned about, but something to be realised and felt, and never so much as under the shadow of death. It was not because he thought, but because he knew that he should meet his dear ones in heaven that he was full of hope, and could speak to those who were filled with sorrow. The departed never go so far that they come not back again, lifting the curtain so that we feel their nearness even though we see not their radiant forms, and touching our hearts with an influence that we cannot help but recognise. And the thing for us who sorrow is to live so that we shall feel their presence more and have more of their immortal breath in our souls.

In the Nation, Elizabeth Waring, a lady of Iowa, draws attention to a fact pertaining to religious statistics, which she thinks has not received the notice which it deserves—namely, the great numerical disparity between the male and female members of Protestant Churches. She says:

"It has been usual to explain this inequality by the hypothesis that women are naturally more religious than men. This theory has been kindly received, not merely by women, but by the sex which it defrauds of spiritual dignity; the disparaged party (with a cheerful sense of having had the best of the bargain) laying claim, as an offset, to a natural mental pre-eminence. There is, however, a class of persons who believe that both men and women were 'created free and equal,' and who ascribe the difference in their influence and dignity to primitive circumstances, whose effects have been unjustly perpetuated. Such persons, acknowledging the essential, and perhaps increasing, distinctions of sex, still maintain that, as civilisation develops these distinctions, it also separates science, mechanics, art, politics, literature—every field of human activity—into subdivisions of labour, these sub-divisions being increasingly fitted to the ever-diverging capacities of the sexes.

"The class that holds such views considers any theory monstrous which denies to men a natural equality in that highest gift of God—a spiritual nature; it therefore refers their comparative religious apathy to some other cause than a native inaptitude for divine worship. The nature of this cause is as yet the unknown quantity in ecclesiastical proportion. Sometimes we are told that the temptations of men are greater than those of women, because their struggling and outdoor life peculiarly exposes them to certain vices; but, on the other hand, it would be hard to conceive of any condition less favourable to that noble elevation and elation of the soul, of which religion is the natural food, than the life which most women are either forced or tempted to lead—a life replete with petty cares, social frivolities, dissipating occupations, and vulgar aims—a life whose vices are indeed less gross than those of men, but whose tendencies are not less worldly. The temptations of Mohammedan women can originate only in their homes, yet they take but little interest in religion, not because their souls have no independent legal existence (for this oft-repeated statement is erroneous), but because the extreme degradation of their lives robs them of spirituality. Believing that these facts refute the theory against which they are cited, I venture to suggest another cause for the preponderance of females in our churches.

"All conversions are effected through human means; and so close is the relation of these means to the end, that preachers of a given class make their converts in a corresponding class, and no other. Now, if we keep in view the fact that the sexes naturally influence and attract each other, we are easily led to the conclusion that (other things being equal) the sphere of a man's influence would be wider among women than among his own sex, and vice versa. If this inference be correct it should not surprise us that since the work of evangelisation has been committed to the care of men, the great mass of converts should be found in the opposite sex. Had we but a few women in our pulpits who possessed somewhat of that influence in religion which Hypatia enjoyed in philosophy, or Madame Roland in politics, we should soon exhibit more men in our pews.

"Well! it may be said that female instruction is impracticable. Yet it was not so to Huldah or Deborah. Or, again, the objection may be urged that all souls are of equal value, and that the sex of the converts is of no importance. The sex of the converts, however, gives character to the religion. Women are at this moment governing the Protestant Church; they sustain it by the funds which their influence commands; they direct it by the preachers whom their suffrages elect—and the class of preachers that women, in their present state of culture, usually select and admire every virile mind has the misfortune to know. It is a class which, in concert with its female allies, has given to religion that effeminate, illogical, sentimental cast too well adapted to prejudice and revolt a vigorous soul. There is a theory, as yet unestablished by experiment, that our race can only attain its highest possibilities in any general department of life when that department receives and encourages the activity of both sexes. It is certainly no slight confirmation of this idea that the Church, which in our day is governed by women, lacks practically and vigour; and that the State, which is controlled by men, is so alarmingly deficient in political conscience."

On laying the corner-stone of a Jewish synagogue at Quincy, Illinois, the prayer was offered up by the Rev. S. S. Hunter, the Unitarian minister there, in his capacity of Grand Chaplain of the Grand Lodge of Masons. The Jewish Chronicle prints the prayer, and remarks, "it is singular that a Christian clergyman should assist by a prayer in the laying of the first stone of a Jewish synagogue. But 'Minlag America' is very advanced. We must, in truth and justice, admit that the prayer delivered by the reverend gentleman on this occasion was beautiful and appropriate—indeed, it shewed excellent taste and diction. It is curious, however, as a first instance of the kind, and we cannot forbear from reproducing it."

A Swedenborgian lecturer, named Parker, who claims to have had a vision of heaven, offers us but cold comfort in the prospect which he sets before us there. It is divided, he says, into zones; and the frigid zone is peopled by Unitarians, who wear lions' skins on their heads, tigers' skins on their bodies, and bears' skins on their feet, and ride in chariots of ice drawn by horses without any tails. Perhaps this is a trifle better than the fiery fate which orthodoxy has usually found for us.

To us Britishers notices like these, which appear in the Liberal Christian, have rather an odd look:

"Rev. Olympia Brown, of Bridgeport, Conn., will accept invitations to lecture the coming season.—Rev. Miss Tupper will remain at Rochester, Minn., as permanent pastor."

The Nation publishes a letter from "A Progressive Man," who has been making a tour through Massachusetts for the purpose of ascertaining to what extent the newly enacted Prohibitory Liquor Law was enforced in that State. At his first exploration he "called for a cobbler" in the bar-room:

"The wine was poured out, and the ice broken, and sugar put in, and the mixture shaken behind the bar; even the straw was inserted there. But when the final moment approached, all was changed. The face of the vendor, up to this period radiant with hospitable smiles, became suddenly overcast with hesitation and dread. He beckoned me silently, and silently I followed him. Evidently the law was now to be vindicated, and the vindication was accomplished in the most simple manner possible—by handing my cobbler to me, not across the bar, but in the small room behind the bar."

The landlord said the Prohibitory Law gave him no trouble. "We sell just as much as ever," he said. "They have notified us to close our bar, and we have closed our bar." The "Progressive Man," after a full examination, arrived at the conclusion that wherever the law was enforced "it is an enforcement against the poor and not the rich."

FIRESIDE READINGS.

IN MEMORIAM.

OUR bitter grief avails not, tears are vain;
No more, oh! never more he comes again;
But thro' the silent hours, and day by day,
Still mourn we for the Presence passed away;
Hushed are the gentle accents, gone the smile,
The words of wisdom and the simple wile,
Which age and infancy alike could win,
"Wise as the serpent, pure as the dove" from sin.

But evermore, and most in twilight glooms,
His presence seems to haunt the silent rooms,
His fragile form to fill the vacant chair,
His well-known voice to vibrate on the air;
And whoso'er there be of pure on high,
Of spirit beauty that can never die,
Of care for others, counting not the cost,
Is linked with thoughts of Him, the loved and lost!

A JEWISH FAST.

A WRITER in the Sphinx (Manchester) gives an account of the Great Fast as observed on Wednesday, last week, by the Reformed Jews in that city, an abridgment of which may interest some of our readers.

The warrant for the observance is Numbers xxix., 7, "And ye shall have, on the tenth day of this seventh month, a holy convocation; and ye shall afflict your souls: ye shall not do any work therein." The "holy convocation," the afflicting of the soul, and the abstinence from work are carried out by a whole day's incessant worship and fasting. And fasting, in this instance, is no case of fish and soup-maigre; it is really and truly "eat no bread and drink no water." Man, woman, and child fast rigidly from sunset on Tuesday till the stars come out on Wednesday night. Very young children, it is to be presumed, are exceptions, but close to the writer sat several little girls, of ten or twelve years of age, who had then, about mid-day, been entirely without food for sixteen hours, and had still some six or seven hours of foodless service to undergo. "Ye shall afflict your souls;" the Jews of the present day would seem to add, "and your bodies also."

The synagogue was oppressively hot—no wonder, considering the number of human beings who had been breathing in it for so many hours, and the number of gas jets which were kept burning. Now and then a worshipper would go out for a few minutes, but such indulgence was rare, and in the case of the ladies surprisingly so. The writer only witnessed one instance of fainting, but felt a continual and unpleasant state of nervous apprehension as he glanced along the rows of pale faces in the ladies' gallery. Let the Christian worshipper, who grumbles at a service of two hours, between a good breakfast and a better dinner, imagine himself, his wife, his sons and daughters, sitting out a service which took up 126 closely printed pages; besides which there were two, if not more, sermons, the one which the writer heard lasting upwards of forty minutes. The Prayer Book itself, though it had an English translation, was somewhat bewildering to a Gentile stranger, if for nothing else because it began at the end. This, of course, is on account of the Hebrew, which is read from right to left. Many of the prayers were very beautiful.

The Reformed Jews profess to have made several improvements on the practice and ritual of their brethren; one is the introduction of instrumental music and trained choirs in the service of the synagogue. The "kist full of whistles," as the old Scotch divine called it, has made a great gulf between Jew and Jew. The Manchester branch of the Reformed Jews are renowned, alike among Jew and Gentile, for the excellence of their music, and the service on Wednesday proved that they are justly so.

The synagogue consists of a nave and small apsidal chancel, and may hold perhaps six hundred people. There is a gallery round three sides of the nave, appropriated, as in other synagogues, to the women; but, unlike all other synagogues except another of the Reformed Jews, in London, the ladies are not concealed behind any curtain or grating, but possess a gallery precisely similar to that of any Christian church or chapel. Downstairs sit the gentlemen, with their hats on—a striking novelty to a Gentile visitor. Whether this is usual or not does not appear, but on Wednesday last they had each a scarf across their shoulders, with long fringed ends coming down in front. Some of these scarfs were worn like shawls, covering the neck and a great part of the back; others were rolled up in narrow compass. Some were pure white, others had a gold border. The ladies had no distinctive badge, except, in nearly every case, a very rich and fashionable costume.

Just in front of the chancel, on a slightly raised platform and facing the male seats, is a reading-desk, capable of holding two or three persons. Behind this, to the left, is a pulpit; on the right a candlestick after the model of the golden candlestick in the Tabernacle of old, though the latter had only three branches on each side of it, while this has four—nine lights in all. It was not used on Wednesday. At equal distances from pulpit and candlestick are two standards, of five lights each, and these were burning during the whole service. From the top of the chancel arch is suspended a silver lamp, which is kept burning, day and night, throughout the year. It is precisely similar to the altar lamp in a Roman Catholic chapel.

The chancel or apse is lighted by three stained glass windows. The centre one of these is partially blocked up by a lofty erection, which, were it anywhere else, or used for any other purpose, would be called a cupboard. A silk curtain hangs before it; and it stands on a platform, several feet above the chancel floor, with a rail in front, and steps at each end. This cupboard or recess, is the "Holy Place" of the synagogue, and is called the Ark. Behind the curtain are deposited several rolls of parchment, profusely decorated, whereon are written the Books of Moses. These are taken out with much ceremony, at certain intervals in the service; a passage is read, and they are then returned to their place, and covered up again; the Ark, and its contents, being always approached with the greatest reverence. The arches, pillars, and decorations of the synagogue are of a Saracenic or Moorish character, somewhat resembling the Spanish Alhambra.

The Rabbi, or minister, Dr. Gottheil, in black gown, broad white scarf, white bands, and black viretta, or four-cornered cap, sat in the reading-desk, together with another gentleman, in scarf and skullcap, who is a sort of curate. On either side of these was a gentleman, also besarved, holding one of the rolls of the Law, in its crimson and gold cover. After a short time these sacred rolls were taken back to the Ark, and their bearers, corresponding, it appeared, to our churchwardens, retired to seats at the side of the chancel. Then followed a sermon, by Professor Theodore, of Owens College. After this, the "Additional Service for the Day of Atonement," occupying twenty-eight pages of the Prayer-book, and about two hours in time. Some few of the prayers were said aloud or silently by the Rabbi or his curate; others were chanted by the choir; others again were partly said by the minister and partly sung. There was a great deal of music and chanting. Some of the tunes are said to be three or four thousand years old; some are modern. Then followed the benediction, pronounced in English, by Dr. Gottheil, with arms outspread, while all the congregation stood in solemn reverence. No one ever knelt; sitting or standing were the only postures.

And now came the most beautiful service of all—the Commemoration Service for the dead; one not to be forgotten. The mournful pathos of the music, the exquisite loveliness of the anthem and hymn, the complete recognition of our own Christian doctrine of the communion of saints—the "sure and certain hope" expressed of meeting our dear ones again in a better world—were indescribably touching and beautiful. Two extracts from this service may be given—the first a prayer, said silently by every member of the congregation, amidst a stillness which might be felt; the second, part of a hymn, to which the music was admirably adapted:

"I remember you, all my dear relatives and friends, who have preceded me on the path to life eternal. The memory of your affection is indelibly engraven on the tablets of my heart. My soul clings to you this day as it did while yet we were fellow-sojourners in this land of the living, and the sweetest comfort that I feel springs from the celestial hope that we shall, some day, be re-united in the world of eternity.—Amen.

"Soul, why art thou troubled so?

Why art thou so sore afraid?

Feel'st thou not the Father nigh,

Him whose heart contains us all?

Lives no God for thee on high,

Loving while His judgments fall?

Look above,

God is love.

Soul, why art thou troubled so?

Heart and eye

Lift on high,

Every tear on earth that flows,

God, the world's great ruler, knows.

"Soul, why art thou troubled so?

Why art thou so sore afraid?

From thy heart has fatal death

Torn the loved ones thou would'st save?

Saw'st thou them with anguished breath

Sink into the gloomy grave?

Death's last blow

Endeth woe.

Soul have comfort in the Lord!

Tears take flight!

For in light

Walk the hosts that God adore;

Bless'd, bless'd evermore.

A NOVEL TELEGRAPH FEAT.

DURING the recent meeting of the American Science Association, at Salem, Massachusetts, Dr. Upham, of Boston, delivered an evening lecture upon the human heart and its actions, and at the conclusion he exhibited in the Hall at Salem the pulsations of several patients and physicians of the City Hospital in Boston. The Franklin Telegraph Company gave the use of a wire between the two places; the heart-beatings were made automatically to send currents through it, and they were rendered visible to the audience by a beam of magnesium light which quivered upon the wall of the darkened room in perfect sympathy with the distant pulse. First a healthy man's vein was put to the apparatus, and the light spot vibrated 60 times a minute. The second was a healthy but excitable person, and the quiverings were 90 per minute. Next the spectral pulse showed that 118 beats per minute were coming from the hospital; and, lastly, the beam jerked at an altogether irregular rate; in the former case the beats came from a patient suffering from pneumonia; in the latter, from one affected with an organic heart disease. Salem and Boston are fourteen miles apart. With a score or so of sphygmographs (the instrument that shows the rate at which the pulse is beating) and a few dozen yards of wire, the hospital surgeon of the future may have the pulses of all the patients beating in his private room.

SCOTCH SAVAGES.

EVERY tourist in the North of Scotland must now and then have come across little bands of tinkers, with their wives and children, trooping along the lanes, or squatting by a wood fire, in some out-of-the-way nook, bronzed to the complexion of the pans and kettles they carry, with long, unkempt locks, and eyes as quick and sharp as those of a weasel. Of this class, whom he thinks the most degraded in the kingdom, if not in the empire, a curious account is given by Mr. J. Mackie, in his evidence before the Select Committee on the Poor-Law of Scotland. He says that as a race they are in all respects different from, and have little or nothing in common with, the inhabitants. They live entirely by themselves, intermarry with each other, and in their general habits and modes of life are peculiar. About twenty years ago they numbered only from twelve to fifteen, and as they wandered about through the five northern counties, generally living in the open air, and bivouacking for a few days at a time by the borders of a moss or moor, their influence for evil was not so felt as to attract attention. Since then they have increased so rapidly as to render division necessary, and now there are hordes of them permanently attached to each county, occasionally visiting one another, but claiming as their residence those localities where they generally congregate. There are two colonies of them residing on either side of Wick Bay, in natural rocky caves, looking into the sea, and so near it that one of the tribe, a woman within a few days of her confinement, was not long ago washed away by a wave while entering the cave on the south side of the bay, and was drowned. In these caves whole families live, day and night, with no furniture, no bedding, no privacy. They herd like cattle. A fire is kindled in the centre of the cave, and around it they gather and have their orgies. Children without a rag to cover them run about the caves and their entrances, and when they come to town are frequently enveloped in a sack or a piece of sailcloth. Their chairs are boulders, their beds are the bare ground, and their dishes are tins made by themselves.

Children are born there frequently, and morning visitors entering suddenly have more than once found adults lying drunk and in a state of entire nudity. Girls of fourteen are frequently mothers.

Not one of the hundreds that thus live in the northern counties can read or write, and the entire social condition of the tinker tribe is of the most degraded character. It appears from Mr. Mackie that attempts have repeatedly been made to bring them within the range of social and humanising appliances, but in vain. Tinkers' missionaries laboured for years, with no favourable result. Numerous ladies devoted themselves (and it required no ordinary courage to do so) to their benefit, but without the least good result. When, occasionally, they were collected in a schoolroom or private house, along with a few respectable inhabitants, to be spoken to and fed, the bulk of them generally came drunk, and it was impossible to keep them together. Attempts have been made to get them to settle down, and offers of house accommodation have been made them, but only with one instance of success in the northern counties. Their source of living is threefold. The men occasionally work at making tins, which the women sell, but the main means of livelihood is in begging and plunder. The children are taught to beg and steal from earliest years, and are most importunate, and the women, who are always accompanied by several children in rags and wretchedness, are not less troublesome. Every penny they earn in labour and by begging and stealing goes for drink, and the result is that when any of them are injured in brawls, or prostrated by sickness, or become feeble by age, they are at once put on the poor roll and become most expensive paupers. In time perhaps we shall come to acknowledge the truth of what Emerson says, that the best political economy is the care and culture of men.

MY BABES.

WHEN God first gave her to me,
That blossom pure and fair,
My heart owned not His bounty,
My lips breathed forth no prayer.

I held my precious treasure
As dear as life could be,
But spared nor love nor service,
For Him who gave her me.

But when the unseen angel
Swept mutely to my side,
And bore my darling from me,
My proud rebellion died;

And, bathed in cleansing tears,
I fell before the throne
Of Him who lent my treasure,
And now had claimed His own.

God gave another to me,
A boy of sturdy limb,
And oft in grateful rapture
I paid my thanks to Him.

Yet still my heart was worldly,
And sordid every dream,
And Heaven in vain shed o'er me
Its sweet inviting beam.

But when the mystic angel
Once more swept mutely by,
And stilled those merry gambols,
And hushed that joyous cry,

I raised my eyes in sorrow,
To mark his heavenward flight,
And saw the golden glory
Of that fair land of light!

So now I wait in patience
Till God shall bid me come,
To join my angel children
In their eternal home;

And though He try me sorely,
Till heart and life grow dim;
Yea, even though He slay me,
Yet will I trust in Him.

THE SOUTHERN UNITARIAN SOCIETIES.

ANNUAL MEETING AT WAREHAM.

ON Wednesday, the 15th instant, the annual meeting of the Southern Unitarian and the Southern Unitarian Fund Societies was held at Wareham, when the day's proceedings comprised divine service at the chapel, South-street, in the morning, the subsequent transaction of the annual business, a collation in the afternoon, and a conversazione at the Town Hall in the evening. The sermon, in the course of which an elaborate review was given of the theological, scientific, and philosophical contests for truth which are now being carried on, was preached to a numerous congregation, by the Rev. Robert Ainslie, of Brighton.

After the service the business of the societies was transacted, the chair being taken by the Rev. J. B. Lloyd, of Wareham. Reports were received from the Unitarian congregations at Wareham, Poole, Newbury, Chichester, Portsmouth, Southampton, Newport, and Ringwood. Petitions were adopted to Parliament for the opening of the Universities and thanks were voted to Mr. Ainslie for his sermon, as also to the various officers of the two societies, who were re-appointed.

THE DINNER.

At two o'clock a collation was provided at the Red Lion Hotel. The chair was taken by W. J. Pike, Esq., of Wareham, and the vice-chair by A. Balston, Esq., of Poole. The following gentlemen were among those present:—The Revs. R. Ainslie, E. Kell, H. Hawkes, R. Yelland, J. B. Lloyd, J. Cropper; and Messrs. F. Filliter (Town Clerk of Wareham), T. Colfox (Mayor of Bridport), H. Hamilton (Poole), B. Squire, Bovill, Ivimey, Simpson, and Sutton (Southampton), Hodges (Dorchester), W. N. Western and R. Selben (Poole), and W. Hawkins. After dinner, and the usual loyal toast of "The Queen."

The CHAIRMAN said the next toast on the list was that of "Civil and religious liberty all the world over." (Cheers.) When he was a child that toast was proposed with bated breath; at that time by proposing this toast in a mixed company, a man would have been liable to scoffs and insults, but in the present day it was not considered an improper toast to propose at any meeting. He, therefore, with their permission, would change the toast to some extent, for he considered that civil and religious liberty was already attained in this country—that it was secure so far as the idea of liberty existed in men's minds, for those who had struggled for liberty were now in the majority and were masters of the position, and if they did not hold their ground it would be their own fault. Religious liberty, after what had taken place during the last session of Parliament, was no longer an object for which they had to seek; and still less was there any necessity to say much respecting the toast when they considered what had taken place on the continent—the declaration of principles in Spain, and the downfall of Roman Catholicism, if he might say so, in that country. (Hear, hear.) The harvest was now ripe, and the fruits were ready to be gathered. Forty years ago it seemed impossible that civil and religious liberty should be attained, but since that time it had become a fact, or so near a fact, that they had only to stretch forth their hands and reap the ripe fruit. (Hear, hear.) He had, therefore, altered the toast on the list to that of "The spread of religious truth," for this was a subject that must occupy the mind of every thinking man. Religion had been under a cloud of protection, a cloud caused by its being connected with Government and civil affairs, with which it had nothing at all to do, for the great Master of their religion said he had no concern with the government of this world; and it was therefore their object to promote and spread religious truth, which had hitherto been interfered with by a variety of causes that were hindrances rather than helps to it. The spread of religious truth was the dissemination of that religion which was taught by the great Master whom they followed. They had no other authority than Christ, and it was his religion that they desired to see spread among mankind. He begged to propose the toast, "The spread of religious truth," and to associate with it the name of the Rev. J. Cropper. (Cheers.)

The Rev. J. CROPPER, in responding, said he would define religious truth to be that which the Chairman had, in general terms, expressed—the truth taught by the great Master of their religion, Jesus Christ. Whatever could be proved to have been taught by him, he regarded as absolute truth, just as, to use the words of his friend, the Rev. R. Ainslie, whatever in science could be scientifically proved was true in science; and, resting upon these bases of religious and scientific truth, they would obtain political truth and right and justice. With respect to the spreading of religious truth, they had to combat with the powerful ecclesiastical bodies that came between them and it; but those institutions were tottering to their base, and long before some of those around him were of his age they would have seen the deposit of all this tyranny in the grave—(hear, hear)—disestablishment would have taken place, priestcraft been abolished, and the oligarchy of the Church removed. The New Testament had been laid bare as to its correct reading, by some of the ablest scholars of the day, and the result had been that of proving the truth of the doctrine professed by Unitarians, in that it was acceptable to every rational and intelligent mind; and there were hundreds of Church people who were desirous of liberty to acknowledge and declare the truth of this doctrine. As an instance of this, he would mention that a short time since he was travelling in Switzerland, where he met a lady, a banker's wife, who was a perfect stranger to him. She said she believed he was a Unitarian minister, and on his replying that he was, she said that she was really delighted to see him, for she had no one to sympathise with her. She told him she had been governess in Lord Derby's family, and had brought up most of the older branches of it. She had been for some years married and living in Switzerland, and had one son, whose religious education she did not interfere with, and she was moved to tears at meeting one who sympathised with her. In the evening, before they parted, she said her husband asked her respecting him (the speaker), and he said it was a singular fact that there were hundreds in Switzerland who were joined together in a kind of brotherhood, and who declared their belief in the unity of God and the Divine authority of Jesus Christ. He (Mr. Cropper) told them positively that the ground was being paved for the advancement of those opinions. (Hear, hear.) He attended service at the Cathedral at Lausanne. He saw very few men there, and he would tell them the reason why. The gentleman before mentioned asked him if he was pleased with the minister, who preached on holiness and the basis of a good life; and he replied, "very much." He then told him that the reason why the minister was not acceptable was that he did not preach what he believed. He (Mr. Cropper) said the minister read the doxology and the creed, and the gentleman replied that the minister did not believe in them, and added, "There are numbers in Switzerland who hold the same opinions as yourself, but will not give up the coin." This, he (Mr. Cropper) could not help designating as gross rascality. (Hear, hear.) A man who would hold a church living and receive pay from the Church, when he was no Churchman, but either a Roman Catholic or a Unitarian, was indeed a rascal. (Cheers.) Mr. Cropper then went on to say that the great obstacle to the progress of truth was a want of unity among themselves. If they would be firm and united, maintaining their principles and advocating them openly, wisely, and charitably, not slapping a man in the face because he differed from them, but holding their ground sensibly and rationally, and making their conduct consistent with their principles—then they might depend upon it that they would make progress with truth and eventually carry the day. (Hear, hear.)

The CHAIRMAN next proposed, "The Southern Unitarian Society and the Southern Unitarian Fund Society."

The Rev. E. KELL responded. Those societies were established for the promotion of what they believed to be the true gospel—a belief in God and the Saviour Jesus Christ, and the acceptance of those precepts which their Saviour gave them. When the societies were first established it was found that Trinitarianism widely prevailed, and they endeavoured by the publication and distribution of books and tracts to establish a form of divine worship in accordance with those pure principles which the Saviour diffused amongst mankind. Of course, if they believed the Gospel of Christ, they must proclaim it in accordance with that mode of thought and reason which seemed to them in harmony with its precepts. The chairman had, he believed, shown the strong desire felt by all of them that those pure principles should prevail, and he had no doubt he would give his valuable countenance in promoting them. (Hear, hear.) He should not on the present occasion go farther into the principles upon which the associations were founded, because he believed they were pretty well known to all present, and they had been so effectually advocated at Wareham that morning. There was one thing, however, which he should wish to do, as one of the oldest ministers in the body—namely, to notice some of those losses they had experienced during the last year. Several eminent ministers had departed from amongst them, and he thought it was only due at a meeting of Unitarians that some respectful notice should be made of those worthies. (Hear, hear.) During the last year they had lost at least five most eminent ministers—Edward Talbot, John James Tayler, Robert Brook Aspland, Francis Bishop, and Henry Squire—of all of whom he spoke in appreciative and affectionate terms. Those five men were representatives of Unitarianism. They had been looked down upon, and mighty men had passed them by and spoken scornfully of them; if they went into company great men would simply say of them "but they were Unitarian ministers." But they were of those who leavened the whole lump; they were almost always in the vanguard of the movement for securing civil and religious liberty and the emancipation of the slaves, and they could not pick out five men from any religious denomination who had done more in their day.

The Rev. R. AINSLIE said that, with all respect to the Rev. E. Kell, he did not think what he had stated had been altogether accurate. Those men to whom he had referred were Christian men of the highest stamp, yet personally he thought they should disconnect Unitarianism from them, just as much as John James Tayler disconnected it from himself. He never liked the term, and it was a well known fact that he never wished to employ it in relation to himself or others. He did not regard those men disrespectfully as Unitarians, but it was as Christians that they made their mark, and he frankly confessed that it was an unfortunate term. He believed in the doctrines that had just been enunciated, and he taught them constantly, that God is one, God is a spirit, and God is love; but why he should call himself a Unitarian on that account he did not know and could not understand, especially as Unitarianism, as such, had had upon it a brand for two or three centuries. They all knew what was the law of this country a century and a half or a century and a quarter ago; it would have hung up a man who dared to avow himself anything but a Trinitarian. He did not, therefore, know why they, especially those who were not educated in Unitarianism, should take upon them, providing it impedes progress, a term of reproach. He might illustrate this by what occurred to him at Brighton.

The Rev. E. KELL asked whether it was quite fair that Mr. Ainslie should say the name of Unitarian would be against him at Brighton, for wherever he preached there would certainly be a large congregation—(hear, hear)—whether it was in a Free Christian church or a Unitarian church. Therefore this individual instance did not count. (Cheers.)

The Rev. R. AINSLIE said this was very important testimony, but Mr. Robert Philips, of Manchester, attended his chapel when there was a very fine congregation, and he said, "Write up the word 'Unitarian' outside, and see how long you will have such a congregation." (Laughter.)

Before the meeting closed Mr. Ainslie was warmly pressed to print his sermon, and consented to do so.

THE CONVERSATION.

In the evening a very pleasant conversation was, by permission of the mayor (Mr. T. Randall), given at the Town-hall, by the chief members of the Association. The hall was densely crowded with a highly respectable audience, including members of the Church of England and various other religious bodies. The old Town-hall was gaily decorated for the occasion, and a most pleasant and agreeable evening was spent.

INTELLIGENCE.

CARDIFF.—The Cambria Daily Leader says efforts are being made at this place to establish a Unitarian Church. It has been urged by residents, who are favourable to the scheme, that it is somewhat remarkable that the nucleus of a flourishing place of worship, in connection with the above body, has not been formed years ago, since the population has greatly increased, and several Unitarians have come to reside in the locality. The promoters are taking measures to ascertain the number of inhabitants who embrace Unitarianism, with a view of hiring a temporary room until they can test the success likely to attend the formation of a church.

DUKINFIELD: PARENTS' ANNUAL GATHERING.—Last Saturday evening, the annual gathering of the parents of the scholars in the old Chapel Sunday-school, took place. Over four hundred attended, and a very pleasant evening was spent in the usual way. The Rev. J. Page Hopps presided, and useful speeches were delivered by the Revs. H. E. Dowson, J. Black, F. Revitt, S. A. Steinthal, Mr. John Chadwick, and others. The chairman specially referred to the high-class education given to the elder scholars, many of whom had passed a Government examination in geometrical and mechanical drawing. He reported the school as in a very satisfactory condition. The rooms were full and the discipline was well maintained. They had lost some of their most hopeful scholars and teachers by emigration, and they now had representatives in nearly every part of the world.

NOTTINGHAM: HIGH PAVEMENT.—On Sunday, the 19th instant, Mr. C. L. Corkran, of Spicer-street, London, preached the annual sermons in connection with the Sunday-schools attached to this chapel. At the close of the services satisfactory collections were made.—In the afternoon, the teachers took tea together, and after tea the Rev. R. A. Armstrong, minister of the congregation, being called to the chair, short addresses were delivered by Mr. Corkran, the Chairman, the Rev. C. L. Whitham (minister of Christ Church), Messrs. Richards, Gill, Clark, &c. The words uttered by Mr. Corkran, both in and out of the pulpit, were so laden with wisdom, earnestness and sympathy, as to sink deep into the hearts of all hearers; and at the close of the day there was a spirit of hopefulness and resolution everywhere visible, which promised new life and strength to these old and valuable schools.

WHAT THE CHURCHES ARE DOING.

The Neue Freie Presse relates a curious incident of a picture of the Virgin in Innsbruck, before which the ladies of that town have been particularly fond of performing their devotions. The upper part of the figure had for some time been hidden from view; but the other day the obstruction was cleared away, when, to the amazement of the good woman who was performing the pious office, the Virgin was discovered to be weeping. Quick as lightning the news spread through the town, and from morning till night the place was crowded with devout ladies eager to behold the sight, and a considerable number of men were also attracted to the scene of the miracle. At last the excitement became so great that the Burgermeister interfered, and appointed a commission to inquire into the matter, one member, in order to secure fair play to the cause of the believers, being a priest. The tears of the Virgin soon faded before the examination to which they were subjected; at least they resolved themselves into varnish, with which the picture had been too liberally smeared the last time it had been in the hands of the painter.

The number of bishops who are to be entertained at the Pope's expense during the sitting of the Council has lately increased not a little, and well-paid prelates seem disposed to seize the opportunity of seeing Rome at his charge. This is said to have raised murmurs in some quarters, but the Holy Father bears it very good-humouredly, and says Providence will provide for all. His Holiness hopes, indeed, that the Council will have but a brief existence, and speaks of its being terminated before next St. Peter's Day.

In consequence of a letter from Dr. Merle D'Aubigne, a meeting was held the other day at the house of the Hon. Arthur Kinnaird, when it "was unanimously felt that, considering the startling additions to previous assumptions of the Papacy which may probably be made at the approaching General Council, contrary to the sole headship and prerogatives of the Lord Jesus Christ, it is desirable that the month of December should be specially set apart by Protestant and Evangelical Christians throughout the world to pray in private, in families, and in social circles, for the priesthood and members of the Roman Catholic Church, that they may be blessed with true saving grace, delivered from all human error, and endowed with full knowledge of Scriptural truth." The week commencing on Sunday, December 5, is suggested for this object. It is further proposed by Dr. D'Aubigne, supported by friends in Geneva and elsewhere, to hold a General Council of Protestant Christians, in some convenient locality, so soon as may be after the Council of the Romish Church has completed and published its deliberations. This would furnish a great occasion for the prophet of Crown Court, who has no chance now of obtaining a hearing at the Romish Council.

As far as at present known, the Archbishop of New York seems to be about the grandest prelate expected in Rome to take part in the Council. In order to appear in becoming state, it is announced on good authority, he has "hired a carriage and pair at the rate of twelve hundred franks a month." We may trust that his splendour will not to much excite the envy of his poorer brother bishops who are to feed at the Pope's expense.

A "Cambrian League" has been started, with the motto "God and the right," its object being to vindicate the rights and abolish the wrongs of the Welsh people. It will limit its efforts at present to the abolition of the State Church Establishment, with its alien Episcopate, and the appropriation of its revenues to national Welsh purposes, without distinction of sect or creed. A petition emanating from this body complains that of the four Bishops of the Principality, one is a Scotchman, while the other three are English; and that since the accession of the Hanoverian family no Welshman has ever been advanced to a bishopric in his native land:

"That of the present four Bishops, one—the Bishop of St. Asaph—is wholly ignorant of the Welsh tongue, and has never been able in such tongue to discharge any function, priestly or episcopal, towards the souls of the Welsh people; that he has nevertheless since his appointment received above £90,000 sterling, in addition to the possession of patronage exceeding that vested in the four English bishoprics of Carlisle, Hereford, Lichfield, and Chichester. That against such wrongs and corruptions, unparalleled in character and continuity in any Church or denomination in the East or West, no peer, or prelate, or dignitary of the Church in Parliament or Convocation has had the honesty, principle, or moral courage to raise on behalf of the Welsh nation, the most ancient body of Christians in this island, a protesting voice. That, in consequence of these and similar long-continued and unredressed indignities and oppressions practised by the State and State-appointed prelates on the Welsh nation, nine-tenths of the population of the Principality have wholly rejected the spiritual supremacy of the Crown and the Episcopal form of Church government."

The petitioners therefore pray for the disestablishment and disendowment of the Welsh Church.

Mrs. Burton, who died recently at Roundhay, near Leeds, has left £15,000 to be devoted to the erection of Wesleyan chapels and schools in Cumberland and Scotland, and likewise £2,000 each to the Wesleyan Home Missions and the Bible Society.

Another ritualist clergyman, the Rev. G. Husband, of Atherstone, Warwickshire, has been received into the church of Rome by Father Newman.

Nineteen bishops held ordination services on Sunday last, at which 273 candidates were admitted to holy orders. Of this number it is noticeable that only 159 were graduates of Oxford and Cambridge.

We understand that the Rev. W. H. Channing has resigned the charge of the congregation at the West-end of London, and will sail for America early next month, being engaged to deliver a course of twelve lectures before the Lowell Institute in Boston, on "Man in the Ages, or Lessons of the Old World to the New."

The Rev. Arthur Ransom, who was lately expelled from the Wesleyan ministry for not being altogether "sound" on the Sabbath question, has accepted an invitation to become the pastor of the Independent Church at Lynn, in Norfolk. And his brother, Mr. William Ransom, of Hastings, has decided, "God knows with how much sorrow," to give up the office of local preacher in the Wesleyan body, which he has held for twenty-eight years. In a letter to the Recorder he says:

"Holding to the Dominical theory, as my brother does, and learning it thus late in life to be heresy, I cannot retain office on false pretences. In practice I have carefully abstained all my life from Sunday laxity. I have often walked twenty miles or more to and from my appointments, whilst many upholders of the Sabbatarian theory (in London and elsewhere) were weekly availing themselves of the beggarly loophole—it is no better in their case, with their theory—of 'necessity' or 'mercy,' to ride much shorter distances. Sunday is a sacred day to me, because I believe in the Christianity of it. I confess I cannot now see what course but resignation is honestly open to Wesleyan preachers, whether paid or unpaid, who hold the forbidden theory of the Lord's-day."

On Thursday morning, last week, there was a "special commemoration of the Holy Eucharist" in the Church of St. Ethelburga, Bishopsgate, in connection with the death of the Bishop of Exeter, and it was also announced that prayer would be offered "that a Catholic-minded successor might be appointed." Mr. Rodwell, the rector, who had on an elaborate purple chasuble with bright yellow lining, over a white alb, and on his head a biretta, read the service as far as the collect for the day, and then interposed one from the burial office. On coming to the Sanctus, a deacon who stood by the side of the rector rang a large brass bell three times, and a woman at the west-end tolled the church bell three times. In the Communion Service, on saying the words, "Take, eat, this is my body," the rector lifted above his head a piece of wafer bread, and while in that position the deacon and the woman again rang their respective bells. This was repeated when the wine was consecrated. At the conclusion of the prayer, Mr. Rodwell stood for a long time before the cross on the altar with his back to the people, showing a large cross on his chasuble, but no one, though a great number of persons were present, went up to receive the communion with him.

Mr. Gladstone has done a bold act in appointing Professor Seeley, the author of "Ecce Homo," in the opinion of Lord Shaftesbury "the most mischievous book that was ever vomited out of the jaws of Hell," to the chair of Modern History at Cambridge, vacant by the resignation of the Rev. Charles Kingsley, who has been made a Canon of Chester. There can be no question that Mr. Seeley, who, when he graduated in 1857, was Senior Chancellor's Medallist, and bracketed senior classic with three others, and who is Professor of Latin in University College, London, will ably perform the duties of the new office which has been conferred upon him. The Daily News says, "Bigots may howl at the new appointment, as they have howled at every good selection of University teachers during the past quarter of a century. Mr. Seeley will possibly feel himself flattered if he receive the tributary execration of the party which has heaped its vituperation on such men as Arnold, Stanley, Jowett, and Goldwin Smith."—Punch, remarking on the appointment, says: "Lord Shaftesbury is as well as can be expected, and Archdeacon Denison is so much recovered that no further bulletins will be issued."

We referred a short time since to the claim made by Mr. W. Grant to the possession of St. Andrew's, the Presbyterian church at Ramsbottom, near Bury. On Tuesday night his opponents intended to hold a meeting in the church, but he had obtained possession of it on Sunday, and retains it by the help of about eighty bailiffs; and when the deacons and elders of the presbytery, with a number of the congregation, arrived, they found themselves excluded, and were obliged to assemble in the schoolroom, where a committee was appointed to decide what course should be taken to regain their rights. But for the exhortations to peace given by the ministers present, there is no doubt that the church gates would have been forced, and a riot probably have followed.

The annual meeting of the Baptist Union is to be held at Leicester on October 6th and 7th. On the first day the chairman, Dr. Brock, will deliver the usual address, and the Rev. C. Williams, of Southampton, read a paper on "The Policy of Non-conformists in view of Ecclesiastical Disestablishment." On Thursday the Rev. C. Short, M.A., of Sheffield, is to deal with "The Best Means of Overtaking the Religious Destitution of our Large Towns;" and Mr. S. R. Pattison to read a paper on "The Relation of the Sunday School to the Congregation and the Church."

Lord Powerscourt, who was so sternly taken to task by his grandfather, Lord Roden, for what he deemed his apostasy in regard to the Irish Church, has given a fine rebuke to those who have impugned the motives of the Churchmen that supported Mr. Gladstone's measure. He has announced his intention of purchasing the rent-charge on all his estates, and of devoting it to the re-endowment of the churches on his property. The value of this gift to the disestablished Church is estimated at from £18,000 to £19,000.

The Indian papers inform us that the Maharajah of Travancore is about to perform the ceremony of Thooloparum, which consists in his being placed in one scale with an equal weight of gold in the other. The gold is afterwards distributed among the Brahmins according to each one's privilege, and it is only after this process that his Highness is supposed to be sanctified. There is another ceremony, which consists in his passing through the belly of a cow of gold; this is termed Erniagherpum. This it is proposed to celebrate next year, as the cost of the two is rather too much for one year.

WHAT IS SAYING ON CHURCH MATTERS.

For a choice little bit of invective, pungent and spicy, commend us to the Protestants of Newtown, Mount Kennedy. A few days since they met to elect a lay representative for the Diocesan meeting, and after duly preparing themselves with "singing a hymn and prayer," they proceeded to adopt a series of resolutions, in which judgment was passed on Mr. Gladstone and his aiders and abettors with a fulness and explicitness which left nothing to be desired. First of all, a note was made of the "meanness" of the motives by which the framers and supporters of the Irish Church Act were actuated. Next, it was affirmed that "truth, honour, and honesty were violently thrust aside;" that "jealousy, cupidity, spitefulness, party scheming, and political poltroonery debased the measure from its inception to its consummation; that it was hurried on with the indecent and insensate haste which denotes conscious but predetermined iniquity;" and that "the hypocritical profession of good intentions and conscientious convictions, &c., which accompanied the spoliation is an impudent aggravation of the offence," &c. In conclusion, it was stipulated that the funds to be provided for the future working of the Church shall be placed beyond the grasp of an unscrupulous Parliament.

The Guardian remarks:

"It is not a little singular that the whole of the south-west of England, as far to the east as London Bridge, Reigate, and Portsmouth, is in an abnormal condition in an episcopal point of view. The Bishop of Exeter is dead; the Bishop of Bath and Wells has resigned; the Bishop of Winchester is arranging for his resignation at an early date; and the new Bishop of Salisbury is not yet actually consecrated. If to this is added the fact that the Bishop of Chichester is half-way between eighty and ninety years old, perhaps the abnormal condition of the south of England may be regarded as including Sussex as well as Surrey."

As no harm seems to have arisen from this unrepentant state, one is tempted to ask whether bishops are a necessary or merely a luxury.

At the annual meeting, on Monday, of the Manchester branch of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, the Bishop of Colombo said:

"With regard to the Africans, if there was one lesson which they learned in the mission field it was this—'honour all men.' If there was one thing which he should like to refute, it was when he heard men of science say some races were utterly hopeless, and did not belong to the same stock as themselves. As regarded Africans fresh from their own shore, it was a calumny against the whole race to say that they were incapable of religion or faith or fidelity, or that they need compulsion to make them labour for their subsistence. He did not agree with the opinion that it was only by means of the children that they could expect to advance Christianity; and therefore, after having heard the opinions of his clergy in Colombo, he resolved to go into the mission field in a bold manner, and he set on foot a system of preaching in the open air to large numbers of persons. Instances of going back from the profession of Christianity were rare, because in Ceylon they had almost got rid of the old system under which men were almost forced to declare themselves Christians owing to their otherwise being inadmissible to Government offices. He honoured the zeal and labour of other Christian bodies, and had often gone out of his way, when he found a good Wesleyan or Baptist mission, to wish them God speed, and had been able to rejoice at any success which they could show. His native clergy were now in a great majority over the English clergy, and unless they could effect that their work was after all unreal; for if they could not find, out of the native races which they were seeking to convert, persons who were fit to be trusted with the solemn office of the Christian minister, their attempt at conversion was a fiction and sham."

In his recent address the Archbishop of Canterbury said, "We must show the age that we are doing God's work;" on which the English Independent well says:

"That is the true appeal. If the Church of England can convince the age of that, she will stand, no matter what forces oppose her. If it should be made to appear that God's work is being done more simply, directly, and effectually by Churches outside her pale, and on principles which she disowns, her doom is sealed. And in these words the Primate is speaking very solemnly to all of us. It is the test by which we must all stand or fall. Traditions of the past are nothing, prescriptive rights and claims are nothing; they are all melting and vanishing under the keen solvent of the times in which we are living. What power of work there is in us for God, for man, is all that the world cares to consider. By effective ministry to the spiritual needs of men alone can Churches in these days make their calling and election sure."

In the same address, the most remarkable part was that in which a limit was set to the probable duration of the Establishment. The Archbishop said, "Probably an attack on it is not to be apprehended at present, though some persons doubt on this point. But, taking what some call the more hopeful view—namely, that the attack is likely to be postponed some ten or twelve years—surely such a hope is but a poor hope." Some of the clergy, however, appear to be not at all dismayed by the prospect thus set before them, but ready to meet it in a true spirit. At an election meeting the other day, for instance, the Rev. W. H. Jones, vicar of Mottram, in speaking of Sir E. Watkin as a fit representative for East Cheshire, boldly said: "He was prepared to say distinctly that he did not think it essential to the welfare of the Church of England that she should remain a State Church. He did not say that it might not be for her present good, or that she might not have derived benefit from her connection with the State in past times; but the time might and probably would come when the Church would see it wise to relax her hold upon the State, or rather to ask the State to relax the hold which it had upon her." While the connection had, he held, conferred great blessings on the country in past times, particularly in regard to education, now, the Church, having accomplished her mission as a State Church, might possibly be able to work alone; and "men might ask themselves whether religion, to be preserved in its purity, should not be severed from that which was, to a certain extent, a fetter to it."

In considering the reconstruction of the Church in Ireland, the Pall Mall says that the great resource of the promoters of High Church views is the use of ceremonial. "Anglo-Catholicism" is rarely preached, but it is constantly acted; and it is the great object of those who have made themselves its champions to indicate that every minute particular of ceremonial, every change of dress and of gesture, every note of music, every architectural decoration, typifies the one great ruling doctrine of the Real Presence, with its adjunct—avowed or not—the Continuing Sacrifice. Now, to the great majority of the laity these two doctrines are simply superstitions. It is hardly to be expected, therefore, that Protestant Churchmen can assist with perfect equanimity at ceremonies which they might once have thought innocent, or graceful, or tending to devotion by their connection with Christian antiquity, but which they are now carefully taught by spiritual advisers have every one of them a specific superstitious meaning. A cross over a communion table appeals in itself only to the common feelings which unite all Christians. But when a Low Churchman is told that the cross in that position implies the entire high sacramental theory, he turns back from what he might before have venerated with the humiliating sense that he would be guilty of a compromise with idolatry in worshipping before it. The conclusion which the Pall Mall comes to is this, that in re-constructing the Church of Ireland care should be taken to give the laity an important share—nay, the preponderating share—in its administration as regards ceremonial observance. Unless they possess this, the clergy will use that observance, as they are doing here by wholesale, as a means, not so much of converting people to certain doctrines, as of enabling themselves to assert that those doctrines are held by the Church. It would probably be right to give a committee of parishioners, acting in combination with the clergyman as far as possible but with an overruling voice, the power to veto any change whatever in existing ceremonial, unless with authority from the higher powers in the Church. This power, properly exercised, would keep it Protestant until the clerical mind changes; of which at present there is little sign.

The Spectator has some difficulty in understanding Father Hyacinthe's exact position. Has he given up the absolute authority of the Church, and become a Protestant? If so, why wait for the Council? Does he still defer absolutely to that authority? Then surely he must abide by the decrees of the Council, however he may still hope to modify them. Punch's dictum on the matter is, "If the Pope in the Council has half the supernatural power claimed for him, let the defiant Carmelite be physically flogged. If this can't be done, the Council had better shut up; it is an anachronism—Hamlet without the Prince of Denmark—in fact, a Sham." The Daily News thinks that since Luther quitted his monastery a more startling signal of revolution has not been given. The intellectual and religious condition of the age clearly indicates one of those crises in ecclesiastical affairs in which all that is needed to precipitate a change is the decisive action of some courageous and conspicuous man. The train is laid; in the chances of history, will it fall to Father Hyacinthe to fire it?

One of the writers in the Daily News on the Byron scandal having seemed to intimate that the Congregationalists had some special aim in upholding Mrs. Stowe and taking her part, the English Independent thinks:

"It may as well be said that Mrs. Stowe has for some time past separated herself from the Congregationalists and joined the Episcopalians. That she has also widely departed from the faith of her forefathers has long been apparent in her works some of which are specially devoted to the ridicule of the Calvinistic opinions of the New England Puritans; but nowhere is her essential difference from the school to which her own father, Dr. Lyman Beecher, belonged, and to which her brothers still belong, more marked than in this 'True Story' of Lord Byron, for here she does not disguise her sympathy with Lady Byron's universalism. Their intimacy grew very much out of their community of ideas on these subjects. Lady Byron's house was a rendezvous for religionists of this order, as may be seen from Crabb Robinson's diary, where by-the-bye Lady Byron's strength of mind and judgment are as much the subject of admiration as her purity and goodness."

CROWN OF JESUS MUSIC.

We have lately met with a musical work for Catholics, entitled "Crown of Jesus," which contains most extraordinary, and to us most profane, language with regard to the Almighty, who is made to hold quite a subordinate rank to the Virgin Mary. The idolatrous worship of the Virgin is very remarkable, reminding us of Pagan superstitions, especially of the worship of Juno as Queen of Heaven by the Greeks and Romans. The following is part of a hymn to the Virgin, entitled "Mary, Mother, shield us:"

"Mary, Mother, shield us thro' life!
Protect us from the ocean's strife;
Calm the wild sea, bid tempests cease,
Through thee we reach the shore in peace.
Amen.

"Holy Mary, we implore thee,
By thy purity divine,
Help us bending here before thee,
Help us to be truly thine.
Thou unfolding wide the portals
Of the kingdom in the skies,
Holy Virgin, hast to mortals
Shown the land of paradise.

"Oh! by that Almighty Maker,
Whom thyself, a Virgin, bore;
Oh! by thy Supreme Creator,
Link'd with thee for evermore!
By the hope thy name inspires,
By the doom reversed by thee,
Help us, Queen of Angel choirs,
Now through all eternity."

Another begins:

"I'll sing a hymn to Mary,
The mother of my God!
"Sleep, Holy Babe,
Upon thy mother's breast;
The Lord of earth and sea and sky,
How sweet it is to see thee lie
In such a place of rest."

To the Virgin:

"See how ingrate and guilty we stand before thy son;
His loving heart reproaches the evil we have done;
But if thou wilt appease Him! speak for us but one word;
Thou only canst obtain the pardon of our Lord."

St. Joseph takes a prominent place indeed in these invocations:

"Blessed be the great St. Joseph,
Sing then with devotion true,
Dearest Jesus, Mary, Joseph,
Heart and life I give to you.

"When in the morning I awaken,
With the Cross I sign myself,
And say, 'Jesus, Mary, Joseph,
I give you my heart and life.'"

An idea of the Trinity is thus obtained:

"O Majesty, most beautiful,
Most Holy Trinity,
On Mary's throne we climb to get
A far-off sight of Thee."

Our lowly Saviour is thus apostrophized:

"Oh Jesus, God, Creator, Judge!
Thee present humbly we adore;
To Thee, in this great sacrament,
Be praise and glory evermore."

At the Holy Sacrament:

"In this Sacrament, sweet Jesus,
Thou dost give Thy flesh and blood,
With Thy soul and Godhead also,
As our own most precious food."

Directions for the time of Holy Communion:

"Go to the Communion full of the love of God (fasting), and with great humility and modesty, keep your eyes cast down, your arms resting on your breast in the form of a cross; modestly raise your head, and with respect, and in a becoming manner open your mouth, and let your tongue receive the Blessed Sacrament. Remember that by one communion well made you may become a saint, because you receive within you the Holy of Holies, nay, Holiness itself."

"When you have received the Sacred Particle upon your tongue, try and swallow it as soon as you can, and with your eyes cast down, and in great recollection, imagine that you are embracing the Infant Jesus, or are at the feet of Jesus crucified. Remember that it is a defect not to pass at least a quarter of an hour in thanking Jesus Christ, who remains within you in the Holy Sacrament for about that time; that is, as long as the sacramental species remain. And if it is recommended that you should endeavour to pass the remainder of the day on which you have received communion as recollected as possible, how much more should you try and pass that first quarter of an hour as well as you can. This is the time, said St. Theresa, to obtain every good thing from Almighty God."

Hymn for the Sacrament:

"Sound, sound His praises higher still,
And come ye angels to our aid;
'Tis God! 'tis God! the very God,
Whose power both man and angels made,
Ring joyously ye solemn bells,
And wave, O wave, ye censers bright
'Tis Jesus cometh, Mary's son,
And God of God, and Light of Light.
He comes! He comes! the Lord of Hosts,
Borne on His throne triumphantly!
We see Thee, and we know Thee, Lord
And yearn to shed our blood for Thee.
Sweet Sacrament! we Thee adore!
Oh make us love Thee more and more!"

Another hymn for the Sacrament:

"Jesus! my Lord, my God, my all!
How can I love Thee as I ought?
And how revere this wondrous gift,
So far surpassing hope or thought.
Oh see, within a creature's hand
The vast Creator deigns to be,
Reposing infant-like, as though
On Joseph's arm or Mary's knee.
Thy body, soul, and Godhead all!
Oh mystery of love divine!
I cannot compass all I have;
For all Thou hast and art are mine.
Sweet Sacrament! we Thee adore!
Oh make us love Thee more and more."

Amen.

The invocations to saints and angels are also most astounding. But the above are sufficient to show the character of Catholic worship now translated into plain English. R. E.

COUNCILS AND PILGRIMAGES IN THE NINETEENTH CENTURY.

(From the Pall Mall Gazette.)

THE great Ecumenical Council, which a few weeks will now call into activity, will bring into prominence many a strange contrast between historical recollections and modern life. When we read of many hundred venerable fathers of the Church flocking to Rome from East and West in obedience to the summons of the successor of St. Peter, our mind goes back, skipping over such recent events as the assemblies at Trent and Constance, which were in truth little more than partisan meetings of the "caucus" order, to the early memories of Nice, and Ephesus, and Chalcedon. But how strangely different the external features of modern and ancient solemnities! Then, the meeting of such a number of representatives of the Church in one place and under one guidance was matter of peril, adventure, and romance. It involved long absences from their respective dioceses. There were dangers from pirates, robbers, heretics, false brethren. Many bishops died on their way to or from the councils. Many had to return to sees desolated by faction or by war. For all round the border of the civilised world lowered the countless hordes of barbarians—Northmen, Huns, Arabs, Vandals—ready to close upon the frontier and break through at any weak point of defence, and rendering at last (as they did for many centuries) the assembling of councils of any pretension to universality impossible. Now, whatever the spiritual difficulties of the Council of 1869 may be, its physical economy will be managed with all the precision and comfort of a first-class watering place in a prosperous season. Hundreds of excellent persons in decent but somewhat monotonous episcopal costume will arrive by rail and steam, free (in all probability) from let or hindrance of any kind, barring accidents not to be foreseen or expected. They will be fed, boarded, cared for, like the guests in some great hotel establishment. Their expenses—moderate enough, from the perfection to which travelling arrangements have been now brought—will be defrayed willingly by trifling subscriptions on the part of the faithful of their respective dioceses. They will con over their daily telegrams and read their daily newspapers. While intellectual progress, such as we heretics consider it, is undergoing the condemnation of the Syllabus, material progress, which we are commonly apt to connect with it, will supply all its new and marvellous resources to aid the Papal design, by lubricating in a mechanical point of view, the wheels of the Council. It is a strange peculiarity of this century that aged institutions, habits, and practices, which appeared some generations ago to be perishing of atrophy and neglect, should be thus aided in recovering their footing by the appliances of modern science, art, and industry. But the Ecumenical Council will afford by no means the only instance of this paradoxical revolution in human affairs.

The report of our consul at Jeddah has recently informed the public that 110,000 pilgrims are estimated to have assembled at Mount Arafat on the occasion of the pilgrimage of last spring to Mecca. This number exceeded by no less than 25,000 that of the pilgrims of 1868. The spirit of Mahometan pilgrimage has thus experienced, and continues to experience, a great revival, simply owing to facilities of transit. The faithful are hurried across Egypt from the west and north by rail and steam. India is furrowed with railways, which bring the devout portion of her thirty millions of Moslems to the coast, thence to be conveyed speedily and safely across the sea to Jeddah. From that port to Mecca the old caravan journey must still be accomplished as of yore; but even there the necessity of going ahead begins to be felt, and we are told that the Governor of the Hedjaz is organising a company, against next spring, for the conveyance of pilgrims in "carriages drawn by camels!" "Let them come unto thee on foot," saith the Koran in the chapter of the Pilgrimage, "and on every lean camel arriving from every distant road; and let them pay their vows and pass the ancient house." Modern devotees, we have seen, are beginning to pay their vows after a far more comfortable fashion. And the sanitary arrangements seem to have been improved even more than the locomotive. "Notwithstanding the great heat of the weather," says the consul, "the public health at Mecca was remarkably good; the total mortality while the ceremonies lasted amounted only to forty-four." In fact, strange as it may sound, the Arabian, Egyptian, and Indian Governments all watch with considerable anxiety the health arrangements of the pilgrimages. A quarantine physician (Dr. Walerian) looks after the maritime part of the business at Jeddah. And the Constantinople Board of Health has informed the various steam companies concerned that "not more than one pilgrim for every two tons of burden can be allowed without subjecting a vessel to quarantine." Those who returned via Suez this year were all "put into quarantine at Moses' Well." Lastly, we are informed that the Medina division of the pilgrims "returned as usual by way of Yembo, and as usual were plundered on the road by Bedouin robbers," the only little bit of old-fashioned romance which seems to cling to the great pilgrimage.

Now the noteworthy circumstance in this curious relation is that it denotes a revival in Mussulman devotion, as indicated by outward observance, much of the same order with that which has impelled the West towards councils and synods, and clerical gatherings in general, and processions to miraculous sites, and other great demonstrations which some years ago would have been deemed appurtenances of ages long gone by. We have seen the Church of Rome rise (as far as outward signs of life are concerned) out of the decrepitude which most observers assigned to it sixty or seventy years ago. Similar seems to be the course of events in Islam. When Burkhardt was at Mecca (1814), the number of pilgrims was about 70,000. But it was then in course of diminution; it was commonly supposed and predicted that the observance had grown antiquated, along with the spirit of devotion which engendered it, and that it would in no long time die out. What circumstance has thus suddenly re-kindled the old ashes of Mahomedan zeal? It may be that the movement is really in part religious, and that as in the various Christian persuasions, so in that of Islam, there has been something of a renewal of original fervour. But we are inclined to attribute a great deal more to the simple cause to which we first adverted—the inviting ease with which a duty is now accomplished which cost of old so much of time and labour. Philosophers and men of science look on with some astonishment at the recandescence of religious activity which begets both councils and pilgrimages, and do not notice how much their own achievements—their victories over space and time—on which they counted for the extirpation of what they deem fanaticism, have really done to assist its manifestations.

But these are only slight eccentric deviations from the general rule which governs the advance of society. No one supposes that the singular reaction which has taken place in respect of the pilgrimage to Mecca will really arrest the slow but certain decline of Mohammedanism. No one, except very superficial enthusiasts, will suppose that the destinies of the Church of Rome, whatever they may be, will be materially affected by the superficial agitation raised by councils and synods and "functions" in general. These things are not really of our day, nor in accordance with that deeper religious feeling which, as we hope, has grown up among us, Catholic and Protestant alike. And the mere mechanical ease with which such matters are now accomplished, by removing the difficulties attending them and effacing their romance, diminishes what effectiveness they might otherwise possess. It stimulates, not piety, but curiosity and the spirit of meddling, and that half religious, half worldly excitement which has attractions for so many minds. Any movement of this kind can do but little permanent good, but may cause serious, if temporary mischief. The "Pan-Anglican synod" is not an experiment likely to be renewed in our time. Most of us think that we got well out of it without greater disturbance of the peace than actually resulted. Just twenty-five years ago a foolish German bishop invited the faithful to the almost forgotten ceremony of a procession to visit the Holy Coat of Treves. Probably he had not the least idea of the strength of the engine which he put in motion. He had not foreseen the manner in which our modern locomotive appliances and publicity tend to exaggerate the tumult and extravagance inseparable from great religious or political gatherings. The procession was popular; the ways were crowded day after day with zealots like the crusaders of old, and it was said that one who reached the tail of the procession had three miles to march before he came to the head. Catholic Germany breathed more freely when the celebration came to an end, but not without some of the evil consequences which might have been anticipated: the faith of many was shaken, and a schismatical movement (that of Rome) took place, which might have had more serious consequences had it not been for the incapacity of its leaders. And we do not doubt that at this moment very many of the more timid, not to say more rational, supporters of Romanism are regarding the preparations for the Council much as police authorities regard those for some great public meeting or show in a crowded city, only hoping to be able to congratulate themselves at the close of the day that no grave accident has happened.

The Unitarian Herald.

FRIDAY, OCTOBER 1, 1869.

OUR UNITARIAN FAITH.

In spite of the liberal tendencies of the age, there is yet much ignorance concerning our faith and work as a denomination. Misrepresentation of our Unitarian doctrines is but too common. Advanced Churchmen shrink from us on the one side; the adherents of old-fashioned orthodoxy shun us on the other. Let our denominational doors be opened ever so widely, conforming heretics in any great number care not to come in among us. Experience teaches us that orthodox believers count us religiously as among the most dangerous of infidels.

Believing that we have a true Gospel to proclaim, a special work to do—that, therefore, the time has not come for us to absorb ourselves in the popular churches—it is good for us now and then to consider our faith in its theological position and practical work. We have yet to walk our way alone—coolly ignored on the one hand, feared and disliked on the other. We are becoming sensible of a new danger in our midst—a weakening of allegiance to our denominational standard. We need, therefore, sometimes to remind ourselves of our Unitarian privileges that we may be enabled to bear the burden of unpopularity, and to resist the temptations to unfaithfulness which beset us.

As Unitarians, we have a faith which does no violence to our nature, but which harmonises with the highest instincts and noblest longings of our souls. We rejoice in a belief which has its origin in the Scriptures, yet which finds its completest correspondence in our own breasts. Our cardinal doctrine is the Fatherhood of God and the divine sonship of man. To us, Jesus is the revealer of our Heavenly Father's love, the "way, the truth, and the life."

In Unitarianism we have a reasonable faith. Reason supports our belief and strengthens our trust. God has condescended to appeal to our intellect in his revelations of Himself. All that He has told us of Himself, of life, duty, destiny, agrees with our innate and cultured sense of what is right. It conflicts neither with our logic nor our feeling, and presses itself upon us with irresistible authority, because corresponding with our own inward light.

In Unitarianism we have a religion of freedom, which leaves every man to judge for himself of the divine revelation of Jesus, and which enables him to aspire to the perfect freedom which is in CHRIST. Freedom among us sometimes take unreasonable twists, and develops occasionally into something like licence; but it does much to broaden and deepen our faith, and gives a freshness to our convictions hardly possible to believers in rigidly defined creeds. Through the freedom in matters of faith and practice we enjoy, we are the better able to appreciate that spiritual liberty which, as CHANNING says, "makes the mind conscious of its affinity with God, and confiding in His promises by JESUS CHRIST, devotes itself faithfully to the unfolding of all its powers."

In Unitarianism we have a religion of progress, which not only admits the possibility of nobler interpretations of divine truth than it possesses, but which modifies its beliefs according to the new light it receives. Unitarianism, while based on the revelation of Jesus, is expansive enough to include all new discoveries of theologic truth. Advancing with man's advancement, it cannot, if it be true to itself, become an anachronism, but keeps pace with the progressive wants and attainments of the human race.

In Unitarianism we have a faith adapted to the deepest needs of men. It affords a satisfactory solution to the problems which agitate the mind in relation to life and destiny. It furnishes an intelligible reason for the difficulties and troubles which press heavily upon men. It is admirably suited to their varying circumstances. It has an anodyne for human sorrows. It has consolation for the heavy-laden, the tried, the bereaved; for it embodies the apostolic triad of faith, hope, and charity, and is grounded wholly upon the assurance of our Heavenly Father's love.

Our space forbids our enlarging on the principles of our faith to which we have referred, and prevents us from mentioning others of equal interest and importance. We may boldly affirm that no other interpretation of Christianity possesses the merit of being so faithful a version of the revelation of the gospel as Unitarianism; and it is our deep-rooted conviction that, in its essential principles, whatever may become of its name or ecclesiastical organisation, it will one day be the religion which, invulnerable from the attacks of scepticism or superstition, will prevail as the religion of Christendom.

A consideration of our great religious privileges should increase our attachment and devotion to our principles, and to our "household of faith" which embodies them. We have every reason to be true to our faith. The churches need its correcting influences. The work of our denomination is only beginning instead of ending. With orthodox prejudice on the one side and Broad Church exclusiveness on the other, with the popularity of ritualistic mummeries and Roman Catholic perversions, with an increase of scientific indifference and the irreligiosity of large masses of the people,—there is a sacred office for us to fulfil as the conservators and expounders of a rational Christian faith. The time has not come when we can afford to be careless of our theological position, or suffer ourselves to be extinguished by our indifference, or to be absorbed into other denominations. Small as our present success may be, there is a great future for us.

We earnestly recommend a renewed study of the great principles of our faith, as a corrective of the growing intolerance with which definite Unitarian dogma is treated. We plead for a greater earnestness in the use of the privileges entrusted to us, and for a greater devotion to the congregational and denominational life of our body. Too often is the critical eye turned contemptuously on Unitarianism and Unitarians even by members of our own persuasion. We have many enemies without us; but we experience too much the truth of the words of our Lord, "A man's foes shall be they of his own household." This should not be. We have a truth; let us hold it fast. We have a church; let us love it, though misunderstood and misrepresented. We have a mission given to us to fulfil; let us fulfil it in the spirit of him "who gave himself for us that he might purify unto himself a peculiar people zealous of good works."

PROTESTANTISM IN FRANCE.

PASTOR C. B. BASTIDE gives a somewhat encouraging account of the state of Protestantism in France, which has been visibly on the increase, while Romanism has been losing ground. Since 1825 the Protestants have opened more than 150 places of worship in quarters where before a trace of the Reformation could scarcely be discerned, while the Romanists have not erected a single new church or chapel for the use of Protestants who have fallen back upon Rome.

According to M. Duruy, the Protestant population, after the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes, amounted to about a million souls. There are no accurate data to show whether they had increased or diminished between that time and the beginning of the present century; but of late it is certain that their number has risen.

The two Protestant churches which enjoy the support of the State, those of the Augsburg and the Reformed Confession, had not more than 580 pastors in the year 1802; whereas they have now nearly a thousand.

In the South of France the places of worship have risen from about twenty to as many as 300; the numbers of the schoolmasters and school-mistresses from 700 to 2,400. In the larger towns, such as Lyons, Marseilles, and Havre, the Protestant inhabitants have quadrupled. In Paris, where the Oratoire and Les Billettes were the only places of Protestant worship, there are now thirty, independently of the eight chapels where there is English and American service.

Additional evidence of progress is afforded by the institution and growth of the various religious societies, and charitable institutions, and 700 Sunday-schools belonging to Protestants; and likewise by the vitality which their literature exhibits, many of the productions of which have earned honorary distinction for their merit. M. Bastide also notices the superiority of the Protestant genius and hand, as displayed at the late Universal Exhibition in Paris, when out of the five gold medals set aside for France four were awarded to Protestants. They are said by M. Puaux to be but 1,500,000 in number, yet they monopolise one-fifth of the industrial and commercial operations of France. They justly enjoy universal respect for their character and conduct. And the only ground for regret which M. Bastide finds is that Rationalism has too certainly insinuated itself into the ranks of both the ministry and laity; but he consoles himself with the assurance that this can be but for a season, as great is the truth, and shall ultimately prevail.

FIRESIDE READINGS.

SELF-DENIAL.

BY ROBERT LEIGHTON.

IN whatsoever grade of life he is
That runs the risk of poverty or pelf,
Great independence and great virtue his
Who can deny himself.

How little shall suffice his actual wants!
How small the service he shall ask or need!
The slights of pride he shall not feel; its taunts
Hearing, he shall not heed.

To what do all our grievances amount
But mostly to some selfish want refused,
Or petty dignity of no account,
Or appetite abused.

And if this self by self can be denied,
These are but waves that seek to storm the rock:
It slips them back into the passing tide,
And never feels the shock.

INDIVIDUALISING.

THE Hive, a publication designed to help Sunday-school teachers, has an article under this heading, from which we take a few hints that seem to us worthy the attention of all who are engaged in this honourable work:

"You have doubtless found, with all the subjects you have taken up for study, that your pleasure increases in proportion to the exactness and intimacy of your knowledge. Thousands of people look up into the midnight heavens, and have a vague sense of pleasure in the glowing stars spangled over the outspread dome; but there are a few whose pleasure in that starry sky is infinitely greater, because they know them one by one; they can call them by their names, they can understand and watch their movements. Thousands of people enjoy the flowers with which Nature adorns herself in the spring and summer-time; but very much greater is the pleasure of those who can tell the characteristics of each plant, the peculiarities of leaf and flower, the mode of its seed-bearing, and the probable objects of its existence. We pass by the nettles in the hedgerows with little care for them; but we should feel a new interest in watching them if we did but know them, and know concerning them, that some fifty different species of insect lived on this one plant, and by their exertions kept it from overrunning and desolating our fields. Just in this way, too, our pleasure in the work of our classes would increase with our intimate knowledge of the individuals who compose them. No possible study of the stars or the flowers could have half the fascination that should attend a growing acquaintance with the elements and combinations of human character. I have often found myself quite indifferent about persons until I came to know them intimately, until I tried to know them in the hope of doing them good; then they seized my interest and heart. It is very possible that some Sunday-school teachers have little interest in their classes, and are flagging and wearying, because they have never come really near to the characters and dispositions of their scholars.

"This closer knowledge not only brings pleasure, it also gives increased power and efficiency. When we are sick we have the greatest confidence in our old family doctor, who brought us into the world and has watched us ever since; he knows us well, and can adapt the healing medicines so precisely to our bodily condition. Thus in our classes we should have much greater power in our preparation for them if we had clearly before our mind each boy or each girl in their separate and peculiar individualities. And in the teaching we should find modes of presenting the truth given us, and illustrations suggested, which we could not otherwise reach, and almost an inspiration possessing us and directing each remark we made.

"In some schools there is an injurious practice of shifting the children from class to class, before any teacher can get thoroughly to know and love them. But supposing you can keep your little ones about you for awhile, then take each of them, one by one, watch awhile their countenances, observe what rivets their attention, try to discover what their face expresses of inward feeling when the soul is really looking out of it. Know all about their homes and engagements. Study carefully on what sides they are exposed to temptation, what weaknesses in their nature need strengthening, as well as what possible goodnesses need drawing out and nourishing. Make each child the subject of special prayer to God. Choose some time in which to pray for your children. Sit down quietly and think about them, one by one; endeavour to think what each one most needs, and what you most need in the endeavour to teach and bless and be the means of saving each one; then your prayer will become a power; that earnest striving to be a faithful servant of Christ in your little sphere will put a great glory into your soul, and shed a great glory over all your work."

"THIS MATERIAL AGE."

IN an address, on Monday, at the opening of the winter session of the Birmingham and Midland Institute, Mr. Dickens thus referred to the croaking of the timid opponents of intellectual progress:

"It is much too commonly assumed that this age is a material age, and that a material age is an irreligious age. I have been pained lately to see this assumption repeated in certain influential quarters. I am afraid that by dint of being constantly reiterated without protest, this assumption—which I take leave altogether to deny—may be accepted by the more unthinking part of the public as unquestionably true. Just as some caricaturists and painters, professedly making a picture of some public man—not in the least like him to begin with—have gone on repeating and repeating it, until the public have come to believe that it must be exactly like him, simply because it was like itself, and really have at last in the fulness of time grown almost disposed to resent upon him their tardy discovery that he was not like it. I confess that I don't understand that much-used and much-abused phrase, 'a material age.' I cannot comprehend—if anybody can, which I very much doubt—its logical signification. For instance, has electricity become the more material in the mind of any sane, or moderately insane man, woman, or child, because of the discovery that in the good providence of God it was made available for the service and use of man to an immeasurably greater extent than for his destruction? Do I make a more material journey to the bedside of my dying parent or child when I travel thither at the rate of 60 miles an hour than when I travel thither at the rate of six? Rather, in the swift case, does not my agonised heart become overfraught with gratitude to that Supreme Beneficence from which alone can have proceeded the wonderful means of shortening my suspense? What is the materiality of the cable and the wire compared to the immateriality of the spark? What is the materiality of certain chemical substances that I can weigh and measure, imprison or release, compared with the immateriality of their appointed affinities and repulsions prescribed to them from the instant of their creation to the Day of Judgment. When did this so-called material age begin? With the use of clothing? With the discovery of the compass? With the invention of the art of printing? Surely it has been a long time about. Which is the more material object—the farthing tallow candle that will not give me light, or the flaming gas that will? No; don't let us be discouraged or deceived by vain, vapid, empty words. The true material age is the stupid Chinese age in which no new and grand revelations of nature are granted, because they are ignorantly and insolently repelled, instead of being diligently and humbly sought. The difference between the antique fiction of the mad braggart defying the lightning and the modern historical picture of Franklin drawing it towards his kite in order that he might the more profoundly study what was set before him to study (or it would not have been there), happily expresses to my mind the difference between our much-maligned material sages and the certainly, in one sense, very immaterial sages of the Celestial Empire school. Consider whether it is likely or unlikely, natural or unnatural, reasonable or unreasonable, that I, being capable of thought, and finding myself surrounded by such discovered wonders on every hand, should ask myself the question sometimes and put to myself the solemn consideration, 'Can these things be among those which might have been disclosed by divine lips nigh upon 2,000 years ago, but that the people of that time could not bear them?' But whether that be so or not, I being so surrounded on every hand, is not my moral responsibility tremendously increased thereby, and with it my intelligent submission of myself, as a child of Adam and of dust, before that shining source equally of all that is granted and all that is withheld, who holds in His mighty hands the unapproachable mysteries of life and death?"

UNITARIAN POACHING.

UNDER date of February 6th, 1838, Mr. Crabb Robinson writes in his Diary: "To-day, at the Athenæum, Milman quoted Sydney Smith, in regard to 'a capital hit' with the squires in his parish: When any one is charged with Unitarianism, they think it has something to do with poaching. 'To be sure, and so it has,' I answered, 'in all true Churchmen's eyes; for what is poaching but unqualified sporting without a licence on the Church's manor?' We have heard that when our little chapel was opened at Welburn, and some of the witty canon's parishioners joined the congregation, he called on Mr. Wellbeloved, at York, and protested that if he allowed the students to come stealing his game, as they were doing, he would hire the public house adjoining the College, and see if he couldn't do a little poaching too."

LONGING FOR REST.

"ARE you not wearying for our heavenly rest?" said Whitfield one day to an old clergyman. "No, certainly not," he replied. "Why not?" was the surprised rejoinder. "Why, my good friend," said the old minister, "if you were to send your servant into the fields to do a certain portion of work for you, and promised to give him rest and refreshment in the evening, what would you say if you found him languid and discontented in the middle of the day, and murmuring, 'Would God it were evening!' Would you not bid him be up and doing, and finish his work, and then go home and get the promised rest? Just so does God say to you and me."

BOLTON DISTRICT UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

THE half-yearly meeting of this association was held at Hindley yesterday week, when the religious service was conducted by the Rev. T. Carter, of Rochdale, and the sermon preached by the Rev. J. Fox, of Heywood. After tea, at which about seventy were present, DAVID SHAW, Esq., of Park Lane, ably presided over the evening meeting, and was supported by the Revs. Jeffery Worthington (secretary), G. Ride, A. Rushton, G. Fox, T. Carter, and J. Fox; Messrs. John Jones (Hindley), Josiah Gaskell (Park Lane), — Jackson (Rochdale), James Harwood and Thomas Kay (Bolton). Letters of apology were read from the Revs. M. C. Frankland (Atherton) and J. S. Gilbert (Rivington), and Mr. Frank Taylor (Bolton).

The CHAIRMAN said: He liked these gatherings—popular gatherings—but he strongly objected to lavender and rose-coloured assemblies. Their meetings were par excellence for the purpose of cultivating social feelings and a personal knowledge of each other, which they could not get by sticking within the walls of their churches. These assemblings enabled them to exchange sentiments, bound them more closely together, constituted them more truly one people. He liked the term Unitarian, which they had not yet cast overboard, and he hoped never would, though this had been done in some of the midland counties. Were not Unitarians Christians? He hoped they were; but they wanted the name Unitarian to show to the world what and who they were, and not attempt to throw dust in the world's eyes by taking up another name which they did not understand. Where they had thrown over the name Unitarian, and taken say that of "Christian Church," had their numbers increased, or had bigotry been destroyed? He thought not. They could not deceive the elect—the orthodox. The term Presbyterian had an historic connection with the good staunch martyrs and confessors, who became the fathers of religious liberty in England. The word Unitarian embodied a belief in one great, undivided cause—the great God and Father of us all—and he (the chairman) did not feel inclined to quarrel with that name. He admitted that it was a sectarian name. They were Christians, and it was only adopted as distinguishing them from other sects. A sect they were and must be, for the line of demarcation was drawn so strongly by other parties and sects, that Unitarians were not allowed to work with or associate with them in any way.

Mr. GASKELL proposed, and Mr. JACKSON seconded, a vote of thanks to the preacher and supporter of the day.

In responding, the Rev. J. Fox said, looking at the signs of the times, they had great reason to take heart of hope. There was a tendency towards the position of the Unitarian Church in other churches, into whose orthodoxy a strong light had penetrated, making them more liberal in their views than formerly. He read an article the other day bemoaning the general heresy which was becoming prevalent, and especially bemoaning the feeling growing up antagonistic to the doctrine of eternal torments. If that feeling were more general, he considered that men would not be led into religion by fear, but by a better, a higher, a purer motive, doing that which they believed to be right in the sight of God from motives of love, and seeking to become acceptable by works of righteousness.

The Rev. G. RIDE, after adverting to the progress of civil and religious liberty during the last thirty years, said, in regard to the latter, a great step had been made by the disestablishment of the Irish Church, and he was inclined to think that in a few years more another Church would be placed in the same position as that of Ireland—not that he had any enmity to the English Church, but he did not like to see one Church placed above another. They had equal civil rights in criminal and other courts, but they had not religious equality yet. He then mentioned his having attended Bible Society meetings in Chorley, at which he had not been allowed to speak. He had offered an annual subscription on condition that he might take part in the proceedings, but this was declined.

After the CHAIRMAN had made some good remarks on the sentiment of "Our forefathers: may we emulate their zeal, and be faithful to the duties we have inherited,"

The Rev. G. Fox spoke on "The Church of the Future." He said he thought a great deal of the church of the present, which, if carefully nurtured, would make a good and useful church of the future. He regretted that the church of the future had taken so powerful a hold of the minds of some people as to make them cold and careless to the church of the present. He was sometimes led to wonder whether in the future Catholicism or Protestantism would hold up its head, or whether scientific scepticism would prevail and the grand term of Christianity be laid aside, but he could not believe the time would ever come when we should grow out of our religious faith.

The Rev. T. CARTER, speaking of "Our ministers, and the men who train them," after a few words in praise of Manchester New College and the Home Missionary Board, paid a fitting tribute to the memory of the Rev. J. J. Tayler, and expressed his hope that Mr. Martineau and Mr. James Drummond would be found well fitted to fill the important offices left vacant by his death.

The Rev. J. WORTHINGTON, in responding for the Association, said that he considered it to be of special benefit to the smaller congregations, because it brought members from other towns and outlying neighbourhoods to meet them and show that they were not alone. This reacted on the larger congregations, for the more the people from Bolton and Rochdale came to the meetings the more they would strengthen their own position. Year by year they missed many familiar faces; last year for the last time they saw Mr. Robert Heywood in their midst; and as these changes came he was the more wishful that the younger members should take the society by the hand and evince a deeper interest in it. With regard to the name Unitarian, he thought there was a growing respect for it, and that if Unitarians were only fully alive to their own position, they would find that they were respected outside of their own body to a degree they were hardly aware of. They had always been noted for business morality: if a man was declared to be a Unitarian, it was said, "We can trust that man." Thank God it was so. But they must also become noted for conscientiousness of purpose in relation to religious convictions, not ashamed of their position, and in whatever company they were (not offensively, but if need be), not scrupling to acknowledge that they were Unitarians. As evidencing the increasing respect in which Unitarians are held, he instanced the courtesy shown to him by Englishmen and clergymen during a recent tour in Switzerland. Congregations, as representing individuals, should take their stand as models of uprightness and conscientiousness. He owed an immense deal in Bolton to the position taken by his congregation in this respect. Some of his friends would hardly believe that the Sunday before last the New Jerusalem Chapel pulpit was occupied by the minister of the place in the morning, by an orthodox Baptist minister in the afternoon, and in the evening by a Unitarian. They perhaps would not be so much surprised to hear that this circumstance was alluded to and regretted by a clergyman from his pulpit. As another instance of the feeling entertained towards him in Bolton, he might mention that an Independent minister had asked him to take part in laying the foundation-stone of his chapel; whilst a clergyman of the Church of England had requested him to be present at the opening of his new church. He believed his position in Bolton was not misunderstood; and that his congregation, under their late revered minister, had taken the standing they had, and were now received and treated with respect. He wished the Unitarians in Hindley to go and do likewise.

On the motion of Mr. J. HARWOOD, a vote of thanks was passed to the Hindley congregation for the reception they had accorded to the Association. The Rev. A. RUSHTON having responded, thanks was given to the Chairman, and the meeting closed with the benediction.

INTELLIGENCE.

MINISTERIAL APPOINTMENT.—The Rev. J. W. Kaye, F.R.S.L., has accepted an invitation to undertake the pastorate of Penrose-street Chapel, Walworth, and will commence his ministerial duties on Sunday next, October 3rd.

ACCINGTON.—On Saturday evening, a soiree was held in connection with the Accrington and District Sunday School Union. About 170 persons took tea together, among whom were friends from Padiham, Newchurch, Burnley, Bury, and Manchester. This number was increased afterwards, when prizes of books were awarded to those scholars who had excelled in Scripture History. After a few remarks from Mr. Mills, who was in the chair, Mr. Noble, the secretary, read the annual report, which was of an encouraging nature, showing that the labours of the Union were beginning to show themselves in the government of the schools, the mode of teaching, and the kindly feeling and acquaintance springing up between the teachers and scholars at the various schools. The committee urged a continued attendance at the meetings, the cultivation of sociable intercourse, which was pleasurable and beneficial in itself, apart from the information derived from the essays and discussions, which was one of the primary objects of the Union. Particulars of the competitive examination in Gospel History were given. Meetings had been held at Accrington, Rawtenstall, and Newchurch, when papers were read on the "Duties of Sunday-school teachers in school," and "How to make Sunday-schools successful." The average attendance at the meetings was about 80. There were 108 teachers and 748 scholars on the books of the Union, 241 of the latter being above sixteen years old, showing an increase of two teachers and ten scholars, as compared with last year. The average attendance was also better.—Mr. Jessie Filcher, of Manchester, after speaking earnestly of the noble work of Sunday-school teaching, and showing that the day for it was by no means gone by, as its great object was not to impart secular knowledge, but to help in the great work of moral and religious education, then delivered the prizes, accompanying each with a few appropriate observations. The first was obtained by Mr. Ingham, the harmoniumist, who is blind; and Mr. Filcher said he could not express his admiration of the perseverance which he had shown in overcoming the difficulties to which his loss of sight subjected him.—The Rev. T. E. Poynting then gave a long and thoughtful address, in which he dwelt on the importance of a good moral education, in which he included the religious. "What was the highest and best thing to give their children? was a question they might ask themselves. He should reply, a truly moral education—an education that would make them good children, good brothers and sisters, good neighbours and friends, good citizens, good servants, and good masters. Could they do anything better than that? Was there any one present who could imagine a higher aim than that? To make their children kind and loving, like Howard; truthful, like Washington; pure and simple, like Channing; manly, like Theodore Parker; to make them like the good Samaritan, compassionate; and like the publican in the Temple, humble. Some might say they would sooner teach them to live for the world to come, while those things only related to this world. He would not argue the point, but he should be content with what would fit men and women to live in this world noble and loving lives, and leave it to God to fit them for the world to come. On one occasion when he was going to lecture, he was thrown into conversation with Mr. John Bright. In reply to a question as to where he was bound, he told Mr. Bright he was going to deliver a lecture on moral education to Sunday-school teachers. 'Ah,' said Mr. Bright, 'moral education. That is a most important subject, and a subject I should not know how to deal with. It seems to me that there is nothing more important in the world than moral education, and yet nothing seems more difficult to give. For my own part, I do not see anything beyond the influence of personal character in the home, and in all the earliest associations of the child.' Now, let them take that observation of Mr. Bright's. He thought they would all agree with him as to what was the chief end to be attained.—Mr. Pilcher then, on behalf of some of the teachers and scholars connected with the Union, made a presentation of books to Mr. Noble, and in doing so bore testimony to his assiduous labours, as secretary, under very discouraging circumstances. After Mr. Noble had replied, a few sentiments were responded to by Mr. Poynting, jun., the Rev. R. H. Cotton, Mr. Ashworth, and Mr. Anderton; and the meeting concluded with votes of thanks to the Rev. T. E. Poynting, Mr. Pilcher, the choir, and the chairman.

BILLINGSHURST.—The completion of the second year of the pastorate of the Rev. J. F. Kennard was celebrated in the General Baptist Chapel on Sunday and Monday, the 19th and 20th September. At the usual morning and evening services on Sunday the sermons were preached by the Rev. Samuel Martin, of Trowbridge, and collections were made at the close. On Monday afternoon there was a tea-meeting in the chapel, which had been tastefully decorated for the occasion. After tea, the Rev. J. F. Kennard took the chair, and made a few remarks on the condition and prospects of the Church. Addresses were then delivered by the Rev. Samuel Martin, the Rev. J. C. Means, the Rev. J. W. Braithwaite, and Mr. Sidney Price, of Horsham, and Mr. Bromham, of Petworth. The addresses were interspersed with hymns, which were very heartily sung; and a vote of thanks to Mr. Martin and the other friends for their services, together with a short prayer and benediction from Mr. Martin, brought the proceedings to a close. The success of the meeting was owing in no small degree to the fineness of the weather; and on both days the widely-scattered members of the little congregation mustered in good numbers. Other friends, besides those named, were also present from the Horsham and Godalming congregations, and the anniversary was evidently much enjoyed by all who attended.

BLACKLEY.—On Sunday last the annual sermons were preached, in the morning by the Rev. William Gaskell, M.A., in the afternoon by the Rev. T. E. Poynting, and in the evening by the Rev. J. Freeston. The collections amounted to near £27.

CREWE: FREE CHRISTIAN CHURCH.—On Sunday last the anniversary sermons were preached by the Rev. Alexander Gordon, M.A., of Liverpool. On the following evening the annual tea party was held. W. C. Brocklehurst, Esq., M.P. for Macclesfield, had been invited to preside, but he was unable to be present, and forwarded £1 as a donation to the funds. In his absence the Rev. B. Glover occupied the chair. After thanks had been given to Mr. Gordon, for his excellent services the day before, he delivered an able speech in vindication of the Unitarian position. "The Church of England," he said, "must still believe the Thirty-nine Articles, and, although it would be glad to be rid of it, must every few Sundays repeat the Athanasian creed; the Independent must still keep in the old rut, and the Methodist must continue to swear by John Wesley; but the example of the elders of the Unitarian Church bid them go forward, to cut themselves aloof from the old moorings, and follow wherever the Spirit of God—which is the spirit of truth—might lead His servants and His children. Here were they freemen; they could afford to despise all this illwill, all this being looked down upon, because they could tell those who did this that they paid pretty dearly for their established positions; and they could say so with truth, for they could point not only to their own humility, but also to their earnestness in the pursuit of truth as one of the advantages which flowed from their despised and not yet established position?"—In proposing success to the Sunday-school, Mr. Booth stated that when Mr. Glover became their minister they had only a dozen scholars, whereas now they had 60.—The Chairman then, on behalf of the teachers and scholars, presented to Mr. John Teasdale an address, right well deserved, tastefully written and handsomely framed, "in recognition of his earnest efforts for the extension of our common faith," and more particularly in acknowledgment of "the devotion he has shown in the extension of the Sunday-school."—Mr. Teasdale replied in an interesting speech, in which, urging to liberal and generous feeling, he said: "Even in Crewe he thought it was seen that they were doing some little good.

They were not now treated as hostilely as they had been. People thought it was not all harm in connection with them, and that there was some little good in them. This last year they had been allowed to join the Sunday-school Union trip to Rhyl. Had they sought that a few years ago he did not think it would have been allowed."—The meeting was afterwards addressed by the Chairman, the Rev. J. Macdonald, and Messrs. Moon, jun., Maybury, H. Maybury, Knowles, and others, and was concluded with singing "For ever with the Lord."

DUKINFIELD.—On Wednesday evening week, the teachers of the Unitarian Sunday-school, to the number of about fifty, assembled in the large room of the Old School, Town-lane, for the purpose of making a farewell presentation to the Rev. J. Page Hopps. The presentation consisted of a very beautiful timepiece, manufactured by Mr. Simmons, jeweller, Manchester. Mr. James Kerfoot, senior trustee, in some very appropriate remarks, made the presentation in the name of fifty teachers of the Sunday-school.—The Rev. J. Page Hopps returned thanks to the teachers in some excellent remarks.—The meeting was also addressed by Messrs. G. A. Garside and J. Cartwright, and concluded with the singing by the whole party of "Auld Lang Syne."

HUNSLLET.—On Monday, September 27th, an inaugural festival on the formation of a Band of Hope in connection with the school was held, when upwards of 120 persons sat down to tea. Afterwards a public meeting was held, at which about 150 were present. The chair was taken by T. Parker, Esq., who said that he had been induced to join the temperance movement about thirty-three years ago, through the influence of his eldest son, who was present at the meeting. In strong terms he urged the adoption of total abstinence from intoxicating drinks, seeing the many disastrous consequences that resulted from them. Mr. J. Walker, of Leeds, then addressed the meeting in a very effective manner, referring specially to the influence parents possessed over their children, whether for good or evil, and showing that unless the example of abstinence was set the children at home the work of the teachers in forming this Band of Hope and inculcating principles of abstinence would be of little avail, taking for his text the truthful saying that "They who rock the cradle rule the world." The meeting was likewise addressed by Mr. W. A. Bruce, Mr. Brian, of Drighlington, a Wesleyan local minister, and Miss Rollinson, of Leeds. In a short report, read by the secretary, Mr. William Stansfield, it was stated that though the society had been in existence only four weeks, it already numbered fifty-seven members. Another encouraging feature mentioned was that one of the superintendents and two of the teachers had, since the formation of the society, come forward and joined the abstinence movement.

HYDE: FLOWERY FIELD.—On Wednesday evening, September 22nd, a farewell party was held of the members of the Christian Church, for the purpose of presenting the Rev. R. C. Dendy, their pastor, and Mrs. Dendy, who are about to leave Flowery Field for Tenterden, with tokens of the high appreciation in which they have held their services during the time they have been amongst them. Mr. Anthony Stafford occupied the chair, and beside him on the platform were the Rev. R. C. Dendy, Rev. H. E. Dowson, Mr. R. M. Shipman, Mr. James Broadbent, and Mr. Robert Howarth. Mr. Stafford, as chairman of the church committee, in presenting Mr. Dendy with a handsomely bound copy of Chambers' Encyclopedia, in ten volumes, said: "We have at all times found him a willing leader, a right good worker, and a faithful friend." He has often told us of our faults freely and outspokenly, but I think we have taken it with good heart, and there has been on each side the best goodwill. Mr. Dendy is a man of quick intellect and powerful mind, or he would not have been able to do the amount of work he has done here, not speaking of the Sunday-school, where he has laboured with much diligence; and though the fruit does not appear to be great, yet the younger members of the congregation, and those connected with the school, will be better able in a few years to look back on the many happy hours they have spent under him, and will appreciate with much more force than they can now the moral and religious instruction he has imparted to them. It is the remembrance that we are losing a faithful friend that now makes my duty painful. It is the remembrance of the many happy hours we have spent listening to his ministrations and the goodwill which has always existed amongst us, which makes it pleasant. I must now say 'farewell,' and may the Giver of all good gifts preserve you in health and strength to fulfil the duties which He in His good pleasure calls you to."—Mr. James Broadbent, Mr. John Bateman, and other members of the church, testified to the faithfulness with which Mr. Dendy had discharged his duties, and the success which had attended them, and joined in warm wishes for his future happiness.—In the course of his reply, Mr. Dendy said: "As he now came to part with them, his thoughts flew back to the time, five years ago, when he first came among them, and he believed that as years had rolled on their regard for each other had strengthened, and especially did he regard and esteem those who had remained with him in the church. There were a few who left when he came; he did not know for what reason, and they had never thought proper to tell him, but there were some who had worked on with him zealously from the first, and he believed they had now a better church than they had before. The place seemed more like a church; when he came to it it was more like a lecture hall. One of his greatest aims had been to see their services especially religious, and one of his greatest rewards was that whereas some of the friends formerly preferred lectures to sermons, now they preferred sermons to lectures. That, he thought, was an advance, and the religious demeanour of the congregation was better than it was. It was not in the increase of numbers that good had come to the place, and yet he was glad to say the numbers had increased, but it was in the regular attendance of its members, the majority being as regular as they could be. Another matter deserving of notice was that the services now appeared more devotional." Mr. Dendy concluded by offering them several pieces of good, practical advice, and thanking them, not merely for the present they had just made him, but for all their kindness and tender sympathy.—Mr. Howarth, the secretary, then asked Mrs. Dendy's acceptance of a handsome dressing-case as a token of good-will from the congregation. The gift was acknowledged by Mrs. Dendy herself, in a feeling speech, which excited deep emotion in many present. The meeting was subsequently addressed by R. M. Shipman, Esq., and the Rev. H. E. Dowson, B.A. A hymn and a prayer closed the proceedings.—A few evenings after this the scholars of the night school presented to Mr. and Mrs. Dendy a handsome album, containing portraits of several of their number. The female monitors of the Sunday school have given Mr. Dendy a copy of Schenkel's "Jesus," and the choir their portraits grouped, and handsomely framed.

KINGSWOOD.—The usual Harvest Home and Special Thanksgiving services were held on Sunday, September 26. The people filled the church at both services. Wheat sheaves, fruit, and flowers were arranged with great taste within the communion, and special hymns and anthems were sung. The Rev. John Birks, minister, preached from Genesis chap. viii, 22, and, by special request, repeated his discourse at the second service.

LEEDS.—After the lapse of twenty months, during which the Mill Hill Congregation, owing to the resignation of the Rev. Thos. Hincks from ill health, has been without a settled minister, they have at length secured the services of the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter, M.A., late of Clifton, who entered on his new duties last Sunday, when there were large and appreciative congregations. In the morning he preached from Romans vii, 2, "The spirit of life in Christ Jesus;" and in the evening, based his remarks on the injunction of St. Paul, "Let us go on to perfection," Romans vi, 1.—On the following evening, the members of the congregation assembled for the purpose of welcoming Mr. Carpenter, and assuring him of their sympathy with, and determination to aid him in all his endeavours. The chair was taken by Mr. Arthur Lupton, who called upon Mr. Darnton Lupton to offer a welcome to Mr. Carpenter. In a characteristic speech, he reviewed the position of the Mill Hill congregation during the past 20 months, and was glad to learn that in consequence of the cordial and hearty co-operation of all the members of the congregation, its various agencies had been effectively and successfully carried on. Referring to Mr. Carpenter's removal to Leeds, he felt sure that he must have seen clearly that duty called him to the extended sphere of usefulness which Leeds presented; and was fully persuaded that if Mr. Carpenter was true to his message, to himself, to his God—if he saw clearly his course of duty and pursued it—it must lead to God's choicest blessings in time and eternity. He concluded by moving the following resolution: "The members of the Mill Hill Chapel congregation desire to offer a most affectionate and cordial welcome to the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter, M.A., on his settlement amongst them." They trust that in the faithful discharge of ministerial duty, and in the love and esteem of his congregation, he will secure his own happiness, and that the union so auspiciously commenced may, to both minister and people, be productive of God's choicest blessings in time and eternity.—The resolution was cordially supported by Mr. Cliff, who expressed the hope that Mr. Carpenter would make the chapel again a home, like which it had not been without a settled minister; and that he would gather the young around him to aid him in his high and holy work. The strength of the future was to be built by the young of to-day, and his experience was that unless some service was rendered in early life there was little probability of its being done later on.—Mr. Carter, M.P., sympathised with the resolution, hoping to see Mr. Carpenter lead his people in every good word and work, lamenting that ministers generally neglected to take so great a share in public duty as from their position they ought to do.—Mr. Harrison likewise supported the resolution, hoping and believing that Mr. Carpenter would be a worthy successor to the noble spirits who had preceded him, and whose labours had left their mark upon the world.—Mr. James Kitson, jun., in the name of the young people of the congregation, welcomed Mr. Carpenter, and could assure him that they were anxiously waiting for him to be their teacher, for they felt the need of some one with a young heart who could sympathise with all their youthful feelings. It was often said that people owed much of what they possessed to their mothers; and, speaking of Mr. Carpenter, he said he owed his Christian heart and warmth of feeling to his mother, and his indomitable perseverance and love of work to his father, and felt sure that not only would he work for the young, but inspire them so by his example as to make them work by themselves.—Mr. Carpenter, in replying, expressed the gratification it afforded him to become the minister of so large and influential a congregation. He would refrain at that time from expressing any general views as to the relation between a minister and his people. How he regarded that relation his conduct would best show, and he would leave it to time for them to judge what sort of man he was and what he would best supply. He had left a congregation which he truly loved, but he was sure that in Leeds he should find one for which he should feel the same. The experiment which the Mill Hill congregation had tried had been eminently successful; for besides giving them an opportunity for looking about for a suitable minister, it had given them some of the joys of self-government, and proved the truth of the foundation on which our church is based—that we seek not so much similarity of belief amongst our congregation as by participation in a common work to nourish the Divine life within our members. We are content to hold our individual opinions, but whether they be the same or different we are able best to nourish thus our spiritual life. He had been accustomed to regard the younger members of the congregation with the greatest possible interest, feeling he had no right to preach to the older and neglect the younger ones. Being young himself, he might have some word to speak to them, and be able to engage them in active congregational work, as well as implant in them a knowledge of the grounds and bases of our faith. He acknowledged the greatness of the trust, imposed upon one so young and comparatively inexperienced, and felt sure, from the hopes held out by the supporters of the resolution, that he would be truly happy and blessed in the faithful discharge of duty, and hoped that he might prove a faithful workman of whom neither they, nor others hereafter, might feel ashamed.—Dr. W. B. Carpenter also addressed the meeting, and said what pleasure it gave Mrs. Carpenter and himself to see their son so cordially and kindly welcomed as the minister of that congregation, and was sure that with such kindness and his own endeavours he could not fail to be successful.—The usual votes of thanks concluded the formal business; and the remainder of the evening was passed in conversation, music, and the examination of various objects of interest distributed throughout the room.

STALYBRIDGE.—On Saturday, Sept. 25th, a tea party assembled in the Peoples' Institute, to witness the presentation of a service of plate, of the value of 100 guineas, to the Rev. John Page Hopps, on his leaving Dukinfield. The testimonial was subscribed for by many hundreds of working men and women, aided by other friends, of all creeds and shades of liberal politics. About 1,000 persons sat down to tea, after which, Jas. Kirk, Esq., Mayor of Stalybridge, took the chair, and opened the proceedings with a hearty and well-delivered address. He was followed by Sir E. W. Watkins, the Liberal candidate for East Cheshire, who described the interest with which he had watched Mr. Hopps' career, and the success which he knew had followed his exertions in the cause of progress.—Mr. Nathan Buckley, the late Liberal candidate for Stalybridge, added a few remarks to the same effect.—Six working men, Messrs. John Ridgway, George Cheetham, William Hill, —Nield, Joseph Whittaker, and John Chadwick, spoke admirably on the advantages of free thought, free trade, and co-operation, and offered their thanks to the guest of the evening for the impulse he had given to these.—Mr. Alfred Aspland then presented the testimonial, which consisted of more than fifty pieces. On the silver was the following inscription: "Presented to the Rev. J. Page Hopps, by friends in Cheshire and Lancashire, in recognition of his unwearied efforts in the cause of progress, of his faithful obedience to the call of duty in devoting his time and talents in advancing the best interests of working men, by promoting a higher culture and better relations with those around them, by helping to make their homes more happy and their citizenship more noble.—September 25, 1869." On Mr. Hopps rising to reply, he was received with the most enthusiastic cheers, bursts of applause succeeding each other for some minutes. He was deeply moved, and at first spoke with difficulty, but delivered a touching address, very solemn in its tone, and the deep silence of the crowded hall was remarkable. In the evening of the next day, Sunday, he delivered his farewell sermon in the Old Chapel, Dukinfield. Long before the appointed hour, nearly every seat was occupied, and as the people streamed in, every portion of the aisles and organ loft was crowded almost to suffocation. Hundreds went away unable to get inside the doors. Mr. Hopps took for his text Acts xx. 32; and delivered a sermon which will live long in the memory of his hearers. Rarely from an English pulpit has such noble eloquence been heard, and at its conclusion the hushed stillness gave way to overpowering emotion throughout the vast congregation.

THE ST. JANUARIUS MIRACLE.

THE "miracle" of the liquefaction of the blood of St. Januarius, of which we gave a pretty full account some time ago, was performed as usual on the 15th of last month. A correspondent of the Times, who went with every disposition to do it justice, gives his impressions respecting it, and is obliged to confess that he "never witnessed any scene, which was so ancient and so famous and the merits of which are so strenuously upheld by its supporters, and which yet appeared to him so trivial, so pointless, so wanting in any claim to reverence, and in every characteristic of a real miracle. The process of exhibition consists in turning the reliquary, in which the two bottles are set, round and round, while a candle is held behind it in such a position as to afford, first the municipal representative, and then one after another of the privileged persons who crowd the steps of the altar, the opportunity of observing the change from solid to liquid. When the reversing process has gone on for three to four minutes, and the dark mass in the bottle still remains stationary, the two priests turn to the altar and say the Nicene Creed, after which they recommence their former action. If after another five minutes the liquefaction still delays, they again turn to the altar and say the Athanasian Creed verse by verse. Then comes more turning round and round, until at length the surface-line of the substance is seen slightly to shift its position in the bottle, showing that liquefaction has begun. 'Comincia' is heard from the bystanders; the priest waves a handkerchief; rose petals are flung on to the altar and steps; a dozen or twenty sparrows are let loose and flutter to the large open window above the altar; the organ peals forth; and a buzz of satisfaction pervades the church. Formerly the guns of the city used to fire, but this has been discontinued since last year. In the meantime the priest still continues turning the reliquary round and round, and showing it to the bystanders as he moves to and fro on the altar step; and each time the dark substance is seen to flow more easily. At first a large undissolved lump can be discovered breaking the line of the surface; but as the time goes on and the reliquary is more and more shaken, this gradually disappears, and the liquefaction is complete, and the kissing begins. The explanation which has usually been given of the miracle is that it is accomplished by heat—the warmth of the candle held behind the reliquary, the warmth of the atmosphere, and that of the priest's hands; but the writer of the Times is inclined to think the liquefaction, if liquefaction there be, is produced by the way in which the reliquary is turned constantly over and over. He was urged before leaving England to go to Pozzuoli, and test the 'miracle' in the Church of the Capuchins there, where there is a stone with red marks upon it, said to be the stone on which St. Januarius was beheaded, and which marks are alleged to grow brighter and sweat blood at the same time with the liquefaction in the Cathedral at Naples. He saw the stone, and succeeded in making out the red marks, on Saturday; and on Monday two of his friends went there, while he remained in Naples. He is sorry to have to say that nothing happened. One of the party was close to the grille, and kept his eyes fixed on the stone for half an hour from nine o'clock, but he failed to observe any difference in its aspect. At 9.30 one of the monks averred that he saw 'tears of blood;' but they were invisible to the eyes of the gazer, and at any rate that was a quarter of an hour after the liquefaction in Naples."

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE MASSACHUSETTS LIQUOR LAW.

To the Editors.—In your "American Notes" in the Herald of Sept. 24, I observe a quotation from a letter in the Nation of New York, from "A Progressive Man," who has been "making a tour through Massachusetts, for the purpose of ascertaining to what extent the newly-enacted Prohibitory Liquor Law was enforced in that State." From the style of the writer, I should deem him a "fast" man, rather than a truly progressive spirit; and it is evident his mission was rather to find out where and how the law could be violated with impunity, than to what extent it was enforced. At his first exploration—he had evidently got the tip—he "called for a cobbler" in the bar room. We have a graphic description of what followed, done to the life, in G. A. Sala's style:—"The wine was poured out, and the ice broken and sugar put in, and the mixture shaken behind the bar; even the straw was inserted there. But when the final moment approached, all was changed. The face of the vendor, up to this period radiant with hospitable smiles, became suddenly overcast with hesitation and dread. He beckoned me silently, and silently I followed him. Evidently the law was now to be vindicated, and the vindication was accomplished in the most simple manner possible, by handing my cobbler to me, not across the bar, but in the small room behind the bar."

Now I do not doubt the main feature of this graphic scene; and to my mind no stronger proof of the vast effect of the law—even upon one of the most unprincipled violators or evaders of the act—is needed. This "Progressive Man" had to skulk into, and squat "in a small room behind the bar," seeking and loving darkness and secrecy, to hide the evil and lawless conduct. The face of the vendor, hardened sinner as he no doubt was, "became suddenly overcast with hesitation and dread." Why did he hesitate? and why did he dread? Surely, here is proof that the law is a "terror to evil-doers," as we know it to be "a praise to those who do well." "He beckoned me silently, and silently I followed him"—not even "whistling to keep his courage up." Need we ask for more proof that the law has a restraining power, even when it is not loyally and honestly obeyed? But we are told, after all this, that the landlord said "the Prohibitory Law gave him no trouble." What about the "hesitation and dread?" and "the small room behind the bar?" and the silent beckonings? "We sell just as much as ever," the landlord said! This is what "A Progressive Man" writes to the Nation, and the editor of that respectable paper insults his readers by expecting that they will believe the romantic representation! There are some statements that only require to be looked at from a common-sense standpoint, and they are so self-stultifying that they are seen to be absurd and manifestly false, as well as foolish. I leave the readers of the Unitarian Herald to accept the statement referred to for what they may deem it to be worth. If as much liquor as ever can be sold under the circumstances described, the liquor dealers will not have much cause to dread the Prohibitory Law; and I marvel that their countenances should be "suddenly overcast with hesitation and dread," when it seems they have nothing to fear or to complain of!—I remain, sirs, very truly yours,

THOS. H. BARKER.

WHAT THE CHURCHES ARE DOING.

The Brahmos have adopted the rite of baptism. The Jatkarma, or birth festival of Baboo Keshub Chunder Sen's fourth child, was celebrated by the infant's immersion. After the usual service the presiding minister offered a short prayer, gave the child the name of "Nirmal Chunder Sen," and pronounced the benediction.

It appears that all the efforts of the Russian Government have proved unavailing to put a stop to the extravagances of the Skopzi, the sect of fanatics of whom we gave an account a short time since. One day last month a party of 400 of them left the town of Balatschow and proceeded to a neighbouring wood to pray. The scene witnessed on their return was horrible. A madman named Wasiloff declared that he was the Son of God, and, after choosing twelve apostles from the party, called for a human sacrifice. Five victims were at once selected, placed on a number of waggon which had been piled up for the purpose, and burnt alive. A woman who had distinguished herself by the violence of her religious paroxysms seized the shaft of the cart and beat two young girls to death; while another female was first trodden under foot and then literally torn to pieces by the fanatical crowd. Other details are given of the horrors enacted, which are utterly unfit for publication. It is impossible to say what further excesses might not have been committed if the governor of the town, being informed of the facts, had not despatched a company of soldiers and arrested the whole party, who are now in confinement, pending the inquiries of a commission sent from St. Petersburg to report on the subject.

King Victor Emmanuel's Minister of Public Worship has informed the Italian bishops that the Government will not seek to prevent them from attending the Ecumenical Council at Rome, but that it "expressly and absolutely reserves to itself ulterior liberty of action," if it shall become necessary to enforce the laws and maintain the State's rights.

For some time past there has been an agitation in France to obtain the Sunday holiday for shopboys, workmen, and mechanics. The movement has been warmly seconded by the clerical papers, which assert that the shopboys and workmen are clamouring for their holiday chiefly with a view to attending mass. The first practical step in the agitation has just been taken by the compositors of Havre, who have drawn up a joint declaration announcing their intention of working no more on Sundays after the end of the present month; so that from November next the Havre journals will only appear six times a week. As it would be impossible for any Frenchmen to draw up a declaration without giving way to a little impressive writing, the compositors have taken care to state that "work on the seventh day is admitted to be anti-social in its essence, and opposed to the constant aspirations of man towards liberty." The editor of the principal local paper is no less eloquent, for in commenting upon the resolution he adds, that he approves it "because it is based on democratic principles, and because he is convinced that the compositors will devote their day of rest to amusements purely instructive and moralising." The general feeling, however, in France seems to be against the Sunday holiday.

The General Sub-committee of the London Free and Open Church Association, understanding that Mr. E. Herford, as chairman of the National Association for Freedom of Worship, has made an appeal to the clergy both of the metropolis and the provinces to preach simultaneous sermons in their respective churches on Sunday, the 10th of October, urging the principles which it is the object of both societies to forward, cordially endorse his appeal.

Dean Ramsay, author of the amusing "Reminiscences of Scottish Life and Character," having been invited to allow himself to be put in nomination for the bishopric of Edinburgh, vacant by the resignation of Bishop Terrot, has declined, principally on the ground of his age.

The Bunhill Fields Burial Ground, having been made as ornamental and inviting as the nature of the ground will permit, is to be opened again to the public on the afternoon of Thursday next by the Lord Mayor.

The Rev. J. C. Ryle, following the example of Canon McNeill, has declined to fulfil his engagement to speak at the Church Congress, and indeed refuses altogether to attend it, because Mr. Mackonochie is to read a paper there on the "offertory." He is at last "thoroughly convinced" that the Church of England has arrived at a critical period of her history, and that if the country cannot be satisfied that she is "really a Protestant Church her days are numbered." First will come disestablishment and then disruption. He has also arrived at a conviction "that there are some limits to the comprehensiveness of the Church of England." Well, we should fancy so, the teaching of the Spectator notwithstanding, as long as the Act of Uniformity remains unrepealed.

At the lay Conference of the Irish Presbyterian Church held at Belfast, the resolution came to was that it would be best for ministers to commute their incomes from the Regium Donum in favour of a common fund, the commutation fund to be held exclusively in trust for the payment of the annuities of ministers who commute. It was also resolved that the laity should raise a general sustentation fund of £30,000 a year. A deputation from the conference to the General Assembly was appointed, to support these resolutions.

At the Social Science meeting a paper was read by Canon Kingsley, in which he expressed himself as opposed to denominational teaching, and maintained that the "State, and the State alone," is responsible for the education of children—or, as he put it, "for the training of those who are to become citizens." He would make ordinary school instruction secular, and leave the rest to the clergy of the various denominations. Though not so decided on these points, he seemed in favour of rating and compulsion. He spoke strongly on the importance of giving a better education to girls, and urged upon the nation the duty of offering some training which may "teach them, what vast numbers of middle-class girls are not now taught, that there are higher objects in life than finery and amusement, that they are responsible to themselves, to the State, and to God for the precious gift of womanhood."

The Archbishop of York has taken the first formal step in the Chancery Court of York against the Rev. Charles Voysey, rector of Healaugh, for heresy contained in sermons preached by him, letters of request having been lodged by the archbishop in the registry. The articles set out the specific charges which Mr. Voysey will have to answer. The first general charge is, that he denies that there was any sacrifice for sin, any need of reconciliation, or for the mediation and intercession of Christ. Illustrations of each of these "heresies" are given from Mr. Voysey's published sermons. An appearance has been entered by Messrs. Shaen and Roscoe on behalf of Mr. Voysey, and the case will, in all probability, be heard in the forthcoming Michaelmas term.

As our readers no doubt have learnt from the daily papers, Dr. Waldegrave, Bishop of Carlisle, after long suffering from an internal tumour, situated between his eyes, and causing at times intense pain, passed peacefully away in the afternoon of this day week. He appears to have been a thoroughly conscientious, hard-working man, with a considerable amount of learning, but with something of that intellectual narrowness which too generally characterises the party to which he attached himself in the Church.

At a soirée of the Social Science Congress, on Tuesday evening, Miss Mary Carpenter delivered an address on female education in India, in the course of which she stated that it was her intention to visit that country again next year, and make Bombay her principal field of exertion, and expressed a hope that the sympathy and help which she had hitherto received would still be extended to her. At the concluding meeting, on the recommendation of the Council, a resolution was passed that Miss Carpenter should be made an honorary member of the association.

The Ninth Annual Meeting of the Church Congress commenced at Liverpool, on Tuesday. Besides the Archbishop of York, eight prelates were present; and the number of tickets sold was 2,500. We must reserve our remarks on the proceedings till next week. We may, however, just mention that on Sunday an able sermon was preached by the Rev. Chas. Beard, in Renshaw-street Chapel, with reference to the Congress, in which he set forth the reasons that obliged him to be a Nonconformist, though to a large extent an involuntary one.

What will the Rock and Record say, and what Dean Boyd and his Chapter do? The Guardian is authorised to state that Dr. Temple, the liberal Head Master of Rugby, and one of the writers of the terrible "Essays and Reviews," will be recommended for the see of Exeter! It may, perhaps, afford some consolation to the Evangelical party—though he is not altogether in the best odour with his party—that Carlisle will probably be offered to Dr. Miller, the vicar of Greenwich. Dr. Moberly, a moderate High Churchman has been appointed to Salisbury; Dr. Wilberforce is to be translated to Winchester; Mr. Mackarness, who was formerly Proctor in Convocation for the diocese of Exeter, but lost the office on declining to bind himself to support the Establishment of the Irish Church, succeeds him at Oxford; Lord Arthur Hervey, archdeacon of Sudbury, a liberal Evangelical, is to take the place of Lord Auckland, as Bishop of Bath and Wells.

WHAT IS SAYING ON CHURCH MATTERS?

The Pall Mall, remarking on the way in which foreigners are bewildered by the open-air preaching in our large cities, says:

"Thus an Austrian journalist who has been recounting his recent experiences of England in a Viennese newspaper, dwells with grave perplexity upon a street sermon he heard in a locality which we take to be Shoreditch, and gives it as his opinion that such sermons are calculated to cause scandal only, and would not be tolerated if the instincts of Englishmen were as delicate as those of Frenchmen or Germans. The preacher was a woman, middle-aged and respectable-looking. She stopped suddenly in a small street leading out of a crowded thoroughfare, took a prayer-book from her pocket, and began to read aloud, whilst people clustered round her by twos and threes until there was a dense ring. After a quarter of an hour's reading she shut up the book, and in a quiet methodical tone commenced a history of her past life, such as, remarks the Austrian, one would rather have expected to find in secret memoirs sold under the rose than in an open street in the face of wondering young girls and grinning boys. Evidently the woman meant well. If talked to she would probably have answered, in that mystic language which itinerant apostles seem so particularly to relish, that she had a mission to perform, and that in publicly humiliating herself on Sunday evenings for the behoof of the inhabitants of Shoreditch she was doing her best to redeem a misspent life. But a question suggests itself to the Austrian—and will also suggest itself to the Englishman who will look at the case from the German point of view—as to what moral end is really served by the spectacle of repentant Magdalens heaping ashes on their heads, shaming themselves in tame imitation of the penitents in time gone by? In the fourteenth century there were the Flagellants, who walked about the streets flogging themselves and each other conscientiously for the greater glory of the truth; there were likewise Recluses, who inhabited cells or cages at the corners of thoroughfares, where passers by came to stare at them. There is every reason to suppose that if nowadays a gentleman were to walk down Bishopsgate-street belabouring himself with a cat-o'-nine-tails in atonement for past dissipation, he would be taken to be examined by Dr. Forbes Winslow. Between the Flagellants, however, and the remorseful women who make public avowal of their degradation in hope of improving their hearers, there is only the breadth of a whiff of air. Both have excellent intentions, both practice repentance with a zeal which can leave no doubt as to their sincerity; but their highway exhibitions do nothing but mischief. If we allude to this subject, it is that Magdalen preacheresses are to be found elsewhere than in Shoreditch. On Sunday afternoons and evenings one or more of them may be heard discoursing in well nigh all the crowded districts of London."

In a funeral sermon for the Bishop of Exeter, Canon Lee praised him, among other things, for "contending earnestly for the faith according to that mixed constitution of Church and State under which we live." We have heard of "faith in Christ," and "the faith once delivered to the saints," but this faith for which the Bishop contended sounds rather oddly to our ears.

The Times has reached the conclusion that the time has come for the creation of a new class of bishops, with less territory, less income, less pomp, less political duty, less to interfere with the discharge of their first duties, and less to excite the jealousy of the sects that certainly, on the now received principles, have something to complain of. The truth is (the Times remarks), at the last ecclesiastical distribution there was a nervous anxiety to sustain the old scale. The old diocesan officials all plotted for a larger episcopal revenue, and even the surveyors and architects were in league to give the bishops large parks and palaces.

A new bishop goes to his diocese with the most primitive notions of economy and unworldliness, and he finds gardens and grounds requiring at least half-a-dozen gardeners, and a house that cannot be kept up without a dozen servants. All his tastes may be quite the other way, but the pomp must be kept up, the vanity maintained, even while he is living personally the life of a hermit, a scholar, or a saint. The mere cares of a large establishment are a serious addition to the inevitable anxieties of the office. But a bishop too commonly begins with a considerable but very natural ignorance as to what can be done with his income. He thinks he can do everything with it, and before long finds it not enough for his ideas. It would be simply a wilful ignorance of figures and ordinary prices to dispute that any ordinary county of England—for Yorkshire might be excepted—can be worked well by a bishop with £2,000 a year, supposing, of course, that he is not overhoused or obliged to attend the House of Lords. This is a time of comparisons, readjustments, distribution, and wise surrenders. The rule applied is the simplest and most practical. We want a working Church, to do as much work as possible, provoke as little jealousy as possible, and to place as few temptations and distractions as possible in the path of those who have the work to do.

A correspondent of the Guardian warns it that it is too sanguine in its view of Irish Church Reform. If the resolution to admit the laity to so large a share of influence as was granted at the late Conference be persevered in, "it will need no prophet to foretell the fate of the distinctive Catholic teaching comprised in the Book of Common Prayer." And he adds:

"I view with much regret the destruction of the ancient hierarchical character of the Irish Synods. The expulsion of deans and archdeacons as ex officio members seems to me to have been a piece of simple destructiveness, as unwise and unnecessary as it was unjust. The element was strictly conservative, and a counterpoise is surely needed to the newborn Irish zeal that would Americanise one of the oldest Churches in Christendom."

At a meeting of Welsh electors, Mr. Osborne Morgan, the member for Denbighshire, and son of the Vicar of Conway, adverting to a charge of backwardness in not expressing his approbation of the disestablishment of the Welsh Church, spoke out thus clearly and boldly:

"Considering that the two guiding principles of my conduct both in and out of Parliament have been the promotion of religious equality on the one hand, and the furtherance, by all just and lawful means, of the interests and aspirations of my countrymen, on the other, I cannot but think that this charge is somewhat unjust. I said, in a speech I made at Liverpool six months before I ever dreamed that I should have the honour of representing you, that the manhood, the intelligence, and the religious activity of Wales were to be found in the chapel and not in the church. I am ready to abide by every word I said then; indeed, I have learnt a good many lessons since. I have heard or read every one of the speeches of the champions of the English Church—the archbishops and bishops—in defence of the Irish Establishment; I have seen the desperate tenacity with which those right reverend prelates clung to the loaves and fishes of their profession; and I have still more lately been edified by the spectacle of a bishop, who, having received from his see in the course of his long episcopate the sum of £448,000, had to be bribed by the promise of two-thirds of his enormous income into resigning functions for which he had become utterly and notoriously unfitted. And turning from that spectacle, I have seen something of another picture. I have travelled through the length and breadth of this country; I have seen the unpretending chapel and school-house, dotting every valley and hill-side—erected without one shilling of State aid—with money subscribed out of the hard earnings of men who earned their daily bread by the sweat of their brow—served by men whose only titles are the hold which their eloquence and piety have given them upon the hearts of their hearers—and whose only endowments are the free-will offerings of Christian men. And having studied these two pictures, I do say most deliberately that the attacks lately made upon the voluntary system by the archbishops and bishops of the English Church are as false as they are arrogant. Nay, I go further. I believe that the alliance between Church and State is an unnatural alliance—an alliance hostile to the true interests of both, because it is founded upon the capital error of mixing up the things which are Caesar's with the things which are God's."

The Pall Mall says:

"Archbishop Tait's promise of inquiry into the question of Church patronage (coupled with the Irish disestablishment) has evidently depreciated ecclesiastical property and produced what would be called on 'Change 'forced sales' of benefices. A clerical agent in the Ecclesiastical Gazette not only refers to 'the number of recent sales' which he has effected, but assures 'patrons, solicitors, and others' that he has distinct instructions from some 300 clients, bona fide purchasers, who are prepared with sums of from £500 to £20,000 for suitable preferments, and he can almost guarantee the immediate (and strictly private) sale of any presentations with incomes of from £150 to £1,200 a year.' This scandal is certainly at its height, and we can now only expect to have the usual market slang introduced into the columns of the Guardian, the Record, and the Rock, and to be informed that 'the trade in advowsons is brisk—prices rule higher,' or 'no demand for presentations, even livings with nonagenarian incumbents and small populations depressed'—according as public opinion and parliamentary debate sets in favour of or against an Established Church."

On the secession from the Church Congress of the Dean of Ripon, Archdeacon Denison, and Mr. Ryle, the Guardian remarks:

"If a pitched battle between High and Low were in prospect, the loss would be serious, especially to the archdeacon's side. Man for man he is worth quite as much on a platform as the dean or the vicar, and he has a larger fund of good humour to his own share than the other two between them could make up. On the whole, however, we are disposed to think that the Congress is just as well without the attendance of these doughty combatants, on whichever side they may be ranged. Neither fighting nor jesting is the proper business of a Church Congress; and for discussion which is to bear fruit in practical issues there are quite as good men left—to say the least—as the seceders who have departed. If we can have the Low Church aspect of things presented to us without bitterness, and the Higher view without levity, the loss will be in reality a gain."

On Sunday last, at the pro-cathedral, Kensington, Archbishop Manning delivered a discourse on the Pope's Syllabus, in which he set forth the pretensions of the Supreme Pontiff with a boldness and clearness which leaves nothing to be desired, though we are somewhat at a loss how to reconcile his views with those which some of the leading Catholic theologians of Germany have just made public, or how such great differences of doctrine are to be accounted for in an Infallible Church, always one in faith and practice. In answer to the question, "What is the meaning of modern civilisation?" he replied:

"The state of political society founded upon divorce, secular education, infinite divisions, and contradictions in matters of religion, and the absolute renunciation of the supreme authority of the Christian Church. Could it, then, be matter of wonder that when the Roman Pontiff published the Syllabus all those who were in love with modern civilisation should have risen in uproar against it? Or could it be wondered that when the world, with great courtesy sometimes, with great superciliousness at another time, and great menace always, invites the Roman Pontiff to reconcile himself to Liberalism, progress, and modern civilisation, he should say, 'No; I will not and I cannot. Your progress means divorce; I maintain Christian marriage. Your progress means secular education; I maintain that education is intrinsically and necessarily Christian. You maintain that it is a good thing that men should think as they like, talk as they like, preach as they like, and propagate what errors they please; I say that is sowing error broadcast over the world. You say I have no authority over the Christian world, that I am not the Vicar of the Good Shepherd, that I am not the supreme interpreter of the Christian Faith; I am all these. You ask me to abdicate, to renounce my supreme authority; you tell me I ought to submit to the civil power, that I am the subject of the King of Italy, and from him I am to receive instructions as to the way I should exercise the civil power; I say I am liberated from all civil subjection, that my Lord made me the subject of no one on earth, king or otherwise, that in His right I am sovereign. I acknowledge no civil superior, I am the subject of no prince, and I claim more than this—I claim to be the Supreme Judge and director of the consciences of men—of the peasant that tills the field and the prince that sits on the throne—of the household that lives in the shade of privacy and the legislature that makes laws for kingdoms—I am the sole last Supreme Judge of what is right and wrong."

Remarking on the Archbishop's exaltation of the Papacy, the Times says:

"His plan of writing Church history is marked by two idiosyncrasies. In the first place, he notes exclusively the good deeds of the Papacy, and ignores what even he would probably now esteem its bad deeds. He demands, for instance, the gratitude of Protestant England for St. Ius V.—the Pope who excommunicated Queen Elizabeth—on account of his share in that victory of Lepanto which broke the power of the Mahomedan Anti-christ; but he omits to quote the same sainted Pontiff's instructions to the Captain of his contingent against the Huguenots to 'take no prisoner, but instantly kill everyone that should fall into his hands.' His other peculiarity as a historian is, that, in the whole course of events since Europe became Christian, the one centre to him is the Papacy. The Dark Ages were never so dark but that Christianity succeeded in shedding some light, and Dr. Manning traces to Rome whatever light it did shed. It there were any domestic purity and peace, any spirit of charity and forbearance, he requires us to thank the Papacy for it. He brings absolutely not the smallest proof of its claim to such praise, except the fact of its co-operation in two great slaughters of infidels. But, obviously, to him it must seem that no proof can be needed. If the Pope is the whole Christian Church, and it is all contained in him, its merits are necessarily his. Mr. Spurgeon is the centre of Christianity to his disciples, and with equal cogency one of them might argue that the merit of all the charities of London belongs to Mr. Spurgeon."

The Telegraph answers the archbishop's argument that education must be godless which does not teach religion. The people of the United Kingdom, professing many creeds, contribute certain sums of money; and they argue that, while it may be right to spend some of this in teaching things on which all agree, it is wrong to spend the contributions of Catholics in teaching Protestantism, or vice versa. This theory does not set up "national education without religion;" it merely limits, in educational matters, the action of the State as a whole, in a part of the affair which can best be managed by the several sections of the community. Other bodies besides the State, deriving their funds from contributors of diverse views, limit their joint action in a similar way. Archbishop Manning is a member, and no doubt a contributor to, the funds of the United Kingdom Alliance, which spends large sums on temperance lectures and tracts, and not a penny on teaching religion or creeds. Does that make the society irreligious or godless? Surely not. Why, then, should the non-action of the State in teaching creeds make the State irreligious? Of course if the State and the Church were one—and where they are the Church is "that one"—such teaching would be right. But does the archbishop forget that wherever Roman Catholicism has had such unbridled sway, she has provoked a fierce reaction of infidelity and disorder? Spain, Italy, and South America were the most Catholic, and are most corrupt. Popery is powerful, political, unopposed in Spain, and there "its offence is rank; it smells to heaven." Popery in Ireland, restrained, repressed, cut off from palaces and great men's feasts, is purer and better in the character of its religion and the lives of the women controlled by its priests. The day of penal laws is over, but so also is the revival for which, en revanche, the archbishop so earnestly pleads. We shall never again see an Irish priest hanged for saying mass, nor an English prince giving his conscience into the custody of a confessor.

The Christian World, after some hesitancy, has allowed the subject of the future fate of the wicked, to be discussed in its columns, but nothing new has been said respecting it. One correspondent tries to show that those who maintain that the doctrine of eternal suffering is unknown to Scripture, to be consistent, "should accept or reject the dogmas of eternal life and of eternal condemnation together;" another, who was led some ten years ago to search the Scriptures for himself in reference to the future state of the wicked, and could not find "a word about endless misery," can never be sufficiently thankful that he was so led, as "the dark prospect of an eternity of sin and misery under the dominion of Satan is now exchanged for the bright and blessed hope of Christ's glorious triumph over the devil and all his works." After mentioning that he could fill twenty columns or more with the letters which have been sent him on the subject, the Editor says:

"A few of our excellent readers—whose habit, we suppose, is to close their ears and to shut their eyes to all that is passing about them in this restless and inquiring age—are very angry with us for daring to let them know that there are any Christian people entertaining the opinion that the souls of the wicked are doomed to destruction. It might be well for them, and for us all, to remember that, whatever our thoughts may be, truth remains the same, and that many opinions, now considered strictly orthodox and vital, were at one time held to be rank heresy. It would do fearful souls more mental and spiritual good than they can imagine to put themselves through a hard course of honest reading on the history of the Church and of Christian doctrine, and to look at all opinions opposed to their own fairly in the face, never doubting that truth will be made all the more manifest thereby."

THE RELIGION OF THE LONDON POOR.

An interesting article in Macmillan on the "London Poor" concludes with the following remarks relative to their religion:

"I am often asked by my friends, men of science, and others, 'What is the religion of these people?' the men of science hoping perhaps to hear that they are secularists; the others hoping to hear that they are inclined or opposed to ceremonialism, as the case may be. Such a question demands a difficult and discriminating answer, and at least I will answer it impartially. Most of them, men, women, and children, seem to live as if they believed that death closed all; and yet I have not found, even among the men, any conscious and positive secularism. No doubt that assertion is made—for you can read it in the faces of those who hang upon the lips of Mr. Bradlaugh in Hyde Park and elsewhere. But he is as much mistrusted, ignored, unknown, as the other self-styled 'men of the people;' and, in my opinion, very few of the poor rise to the conception of atheism. I came across only two men who took the trouble to profess infidelity: one, a cobbler in the Hackney Road, very drunk and combative, and diverting, whose one wish was to have an argument, political and religious, and who, on being disappointed of that, went to sleep; the other, a basket-maker in Bethnal Green, reduced to dock labour by his turn for oratory. The Scripture-reader, in the tone which he would have used in warning me that I should find him leprous, warned me that I should find him a free-thinker; and, indeed, he opened fire on me by saying that 'Moses never wrote The Pentateuch.' One other speculator I knew, a drayman, whom I found reading a Scotch work on salvation, very metaphysical, very full of Latin and Greek; but since he was reading it only because he had no other books, and since he took kindly to the Waverley novels, I pass him by. Those who actually have any dogmatic religion may be said to be anything which their spiritual director for the time being chooses to make them, and when his direction ceases, to remain for various periods under its influence. A popular clergyman or minister can give them, especially when young, an appearance of Ritualism or Puritanism, can make them seem Calvinists or Arminians; and the lacquer sometimes lasts, and sometimes is washed off or worn away. My friends affected as a rule to be Evangelical; they repeated the conventional formularies; they groaned over Popery; one of them—a boy of fourteen—used to throw out of his plate cabbage which had been bought on Sunday. When I read tracts or the Bible to those of them who were old, they listened with due attention, and made pious remarks. But I am afraid that their main purpose in going to church or chapel was to get the doles which they persisted in supposing would reward their attendance there. The great majority went for nothing else than the hope of these doles, and had no notions of Christianity. If you suggested any utilitarian motives for church or chapel-going—the beauty of music and building, the rest, the novelty—you suggested them in vain."

LITERARIA.

It is stated that Garibaldi is about to publish a work of his own, to be entitled "Rome in the Nineteenth Century." It will be spirited enough, no doubt, and hard upon the priests.

Some few months ago there appeared in Holland a volume of sermons by Dr. Taalburg, a clergyman of the National Reformed Church, entitled "The Religion of Jesus and Modern Tendencies." This paragraph was found in it: "The old Calvinists deduced from the Sovereignty of God the dogma of everlasting damnation; but it is equally consistent and authoritative to found upon it, as St. Paul did, the doctrine of universal and everlasting happiness, when 'God shall be all in all.'" The volume led to the prosecution of the author in the Church courts by the Orthodox party, where it was decided that, notwithstanding this avowal, he had not violated his creed. One may be a Universalist in Holland, and yet evangelical. About five years ago a work was published by another clergyman of the National Church of Holland, in which he says: "It is an error to consider eternal punishment as an integral part of the evangelical doctrine;" and this book was crowned by the "Hague Society for the Defence of the Christian Religion."

The marvellous success of "Hymns, Ancient and Modern," has culminated in a penny edition.

Mr. William Howitt is busy on a history of the Society of Friends, of which he was formerly a member, and which presents in past times many points both of interest and instruction.

Mr. Murray has in the press a volume of essays to be entitled "The Church and the Age," under the editorship of the Rev. W. D. MacLagan and the Rev. Archibald Weir. In the list of writers appear the names of the Bishop of Gloucester, the Dean of Chichester, Sir Bartle Frere, Dr. Barry, Dr. Irons, Rev. Charles Pritchard, F.R.S., Professor Burrows, and others. Among the subjects occur the following: "The Progress and Direction of Modern Thought," "Science and Faith," "Liturgies and Ritual," "The Place of the Laity in Church Government," "The Church and Education."

The Rev. George Bartle, D.D., Principal of Walton College, Liverpool, has published a singular book, entitled "The Scriptural Doctrine of Hades," in which he institutes an inquiry into the state of the righteous and the wicked between the time of their death and the general judgment, and tries to prove from the Bible that the atonement for the sins of mankind was not made, as commonly supposed, in this world, on the Cross. He believes in a Purgatory—or rather a Hades—where souls exist in a state which is neither completely happy nor completely miserable, awaiting the sentence which is to consign them to a perfect Heaven or an utter Hell.

"The Life and Remains of the Rev. Dr. Lee," the well-known liberal minister of Old Greyfriars, Edinburgh, and Chaplain in Ordinary to the Queen, is shortly to appear. Mrs. Oliphant contributes an introductory chapter, but the biographer is the Rev. R. H. Story, of Roseneath.

VILLAGE WORK.

A few weeks ago, we alluded to an article in the English Independent on "Our Colleges," and afterwards made a few remarks on a letter to the same paper which the article called forth from "A Young Candidate," that seemed to us, not only to display "intense self-conceit," but likewise, as we endeavoured to show, to be based on one or two false assumptions. In the next number of our contemporary, the "Young Candidate" attempted a reply to our remarks, but this was written in so hazy a style that we failed to perceive any point in it, and determined, therefore, to let it pass unnoticed. In last week's Independent, however, appeared an answer to it from "A Village Pastor" (who proves at least that he can write clearly and forcibly) which so well expresses our own feeling that we give it entire:

"In the letters of 'A Young Candidate' (both in the first instance and in his reply to the Unitarian Herald), two things seem to be taken for granted, the truth or otherwise of which affects the whole question at issue. He assumes (1) that the years spent in acquiring a collegiate education are 'given for naught' if the student settle in a village, and begin at the 'bottom of the ladder;' and, also (2), that the non-collegiate pastor is not qualified to combat the intelligent scepticism and rationalism of the age.

"The first mistake is based on an entirely wrong notion as to the requirements of a village congregation. While 'A Young Candidate' admits that the souls of labourers are as precious as those of 'scientific sceptics,' he seems to forget that Dissenting congregations in villages are not entirely, or even very largely, composed of ignorant men. The intellectual distinction between the congregation in a large town and in a village is not one in kind but in degree only. Taking the average of the country, the number of people who can appreciate learning and culture in a pastor is as proportionately great in the lesser as in the greater assembly. The library in the village home is furnished with a goodly supply of standard books; the mass of healthy periodical literature finds its way in part to the table there; and the young people are well-educated and intelligent. The village churches are fully aware of the fact that our town ministers have an arduous and a special work to do; they are also fully convinced that our colleges will not fail in their great end if they send a goodly number of their 'trained and polished' minds to minister to the spiritual life of the intelligent men and women who usually constitute the 'village congregation.'

"The second error is based on a wrong idea as to the previous life, education, and habits of the men who usually come to the village church (sometimes to the town congregation also) to do ministerial work and undertake ministerial responsibility without the advantage of a collegiate training. 'A Young Candidate' may not perhaps be aware that the non-collegiate is not necessarily a raw, untrained recruit. Surely, it is not absolutely essential that a young man shall go to college to learn how to 'clear away those false doctrines' to which your correspondent refers? None can justly depreciate learning as a powerful instrument for good in the hands of the minister of Christ; none can doubt the truth or wisdom of Mr. Binney's well-timed words, spoken at the opening of Brecon College, when he said that we want 'men of large knowledge and thorough culture to do the work in the world which the Church has now to do;' and 'if there is to be anything of power in the Church, there must be men capable of meeting and overthrowing the many errors that are constantly arising;' but is it not more than possible that many of our non-collegiate pastors, whom 'A Young Candidate' would reserve for village work, have obtained this 'knowledge' and this 'culture' from other sources than the College?

"The men whose training is denoted in our Year-book by the word 'Private' are doubtless fully aware of the necessity which exists for a ministry properly equipped at all points for the warfare in which they have to engage; but if it was possible to inquire into the facts of their history previous to their entering our ministry, it would, I think, be found that, by education as well as by social and religious influences and surroundings, their whole life had been one grand course of preparation for their work. The same may be true of the men who are drafted off to our colleges; let us hope it is.

"There can be no doubt that the general results of the training in our colleges are beneficial; but while it is sometimes true, on the one hand, that the young man's 'first love' is cooled, his ardour and zeal in the cause of Christ abated, and himself turned into something like a theological hair-splitter by a lengthened residence in college, it is equally true, on the other hand, that many (though not by any means all) of our village preachers have brought and applied to their work the mathematical, and scientific, and theological knowledge which their brethren seek and obtain at the hands of our college tutors. Let none think, because many of the men who are doing work in small places have not had a college training, that they are either 'untrained,' 'unpolished,' or on that account less fitted to resist the encroachments of rationalism, infidelity, and atheism."

THE HISTORY OF TITHES.

The earliest mention of tithes is in the Book of Samuel, when the nation is threatened by the prophet, that if they place over themselves a king he will claim for himself a tithe of their land's produce as a tax for his own use. This was written in the reign of Solomon, whose historian tells us that he did levy a tax on the produce of the land, and we may suppose that it was of that amount. The kings of Egypt, as we learn from the life of Joseph, levied a land tax of double that amount; but then Egypt was a more fertile country and could bear a heavier tax than Judea. In the life of Abraham that patriarch is made to pay tithes to the king of Jerusalem, which, as that life was written in the reign of Solomon, seems meant to justify that king's land tax. In Numbers xviii. the tithes are for the first time granted to the Levites. This law was certainly not written till after the reign of Solomon, and probably it belongs to the reign of Jehoshaphat, who, as a child, was wholly governed by the priest who placed him on the throne, and whose power was far too weak for him to collect any taxes except by the help of the Levites. The tax, however, was very irregularly collected, and after a time not paid at all. Hezekiah enforced it by a new command; but in the reign of Josiah it was found so far difficult to collect it that the law of Deuteronomy xii. and xiv. is satisfied if it is carried up to Jerusalem and there consumed by the owner, who is required to share it with his household and the Levite who may have accompanied him to the capital. After the return from captivity, Nehemiah endeavoured to enforce the law of Numbers xviii., that every man should pay his tithes to the Levites in his own neighbourhood. But it would seem that this was only to be done once in three years, as the law to that effect in Deuteronomy xiv. and xxvi. was probably then written. This law, indeed, only orders the owner to share it with the Levite and the poor. At the time of Christ, when the priests had no power of levying a tax, the tithe, as we learn from the New Testament, was occasionally paid by persons scrupulously desirous of obeying the law. But with the ruin of Judea we hear no more of tithes, until in the fourth century, when the Abbot John of Lycopolis, in Egypt, called upon the faithful to set aside that portion of their income for the poor. This was cheerfully done; and this pious custom was soon copied by the rest of Christendom. The clergy were the receivers of the gift; but in the course of years they gradually applied it to their own use, and supported their right to it by quoting the law in the Book of Numbers. Selden, however, in his history of modern tithes, considers that they owe their origin to the pious zeal of the Egyptian monk, John of Lycopolis.

DIVERSITY OF GIFTS IN THE MINISTRY.

It is gratifying to know that the condition and prospects of the ministry amongst us are occupying a large and increasing amount of attention. If the knowledge of a disease be indeed half its cure, we are rapidly approaching convalescence. That we have long been in a weak and unsatisfactory state, that the numerical strength of our pulpit supplies has been and is far below the demand, and that there is an urgent need for active measures, are facts now so widely known and generally admitted as to form a broad and common basis for prompt and vigorous action. The most experienced of our ministers, and the most thoughtful and energetic of our laymen, are alike penetrated with the conviction that something must be done, and that it will be doubly valuable if done quickly.

But it seems to us at this juncture equally important to remember, that not only are accessions to the ranks of the ministry essential to the prosperity, if not to the existence, of our churches, but that the work to be done demands a considerable variety of attainment, capacity, and general qualifications. That church makes a fundamental mistake, which fails to recognise and provide for its different, and often changing requirements. In some quarters, from which better things might be expected, there seems to prevail a narrow, petty, and mischievous idea, that only one particular type and class of ministers is needed, and that no other is to be tolerated. Our opinions as to the vital importance of maintaining a high standard of acquirement, and of perpetuating the influence of a line of preachers who are also accomplished scholars and theologians, should by this time be not unknown. Never was there a period when qualifications of this order were more imperatively demanded. But surely that is a very partial and imperfect estimate, which is satisfied with but one particular kind of services, and which does not, or will not acknowledge, that for every department of their varied activities a diversity of gifts is essential to the progress and prosperity of the churches.

Illustrations of our argument present themselves on every page of history, and are patent to the most cursory inquirer, whom prejudice does not blind to the truth. In the primitive churches we find numerous indications of a readiness to recognise, and a willingness to respond to and provide for the requirements of the time, however diversified they may have been. "Now there are differences of gifts, but the same spirit. And there are differences of spirit, but the same LORD. And there are differences of workings, but the same God, who worketh all things in all men." Again: "God hath placed some in the church, first apostles, secondly prophets, thirdly teachers, then mighty works, then gifts of healings, helps, governments, kinds of languages. Are all apostles? Are all prophets? Are all teachers? Are all mighty workers? Have all gifts of healing? Do all speak with languages? Do all interpret?" Surely there is here but little encouragement for the doctrine of a restricted class of Christian ministers!

In the oldest and greatest of ecclesiastical organisations—the one to which all other churches, however else opposed, look with a gaze seldom unrewarded for suggestions of experience, resource, and skill in government and discipline—the principle we are advocating meets with the most ample recognition. The variety of its methods is almost infinite, and the special pains with which it prepares an agent for every kind of labour, is hardly less than wonderful. It knows nothing of a ministry of one class or order alone. It wants learned theologians—and provides schools for them. It asks for missionaries—and prepares them by special and elaborate training. It requires eloquent, rousing, and persuasive preachers—and first setting aside men of promising aptitudes, it supplies them with suitable tuition, the choicest advantages, and the most favourable opportunities alike for study and for practice. Assailing the lowest forms of civilisation, it arms its agents for the particular task assigned to them; and seeking converts among the cultivated and the polished, it equips an astute and accomplished band of servants, whose resources are inexhaustible, who neither recognise defeat nor betray the inflation of success. Like a well-appointed army, the Romish Church has a suitable weapon for every form of attack, and is prepared for defence with every engine that science, experience, and skill can provide.

We venture to think that, for efficient action, our own body must adopt tactics of similar variety, and on its humbler and more limited stage, emulate in these respects the example of the greatest Church of Christendom. It is our business to adapt means to ends; and not dogmatically to declare that one mode of action alone is possible. Every agency wisely adapted for a special purpose, is alike worthy of countenance and support. Every recognised and established institution amongst us, should command not only sympathy but practical aid. He is the worst enemy to his church, who strives to throw discord into its ranks; and to excite jealousy and distrust among those who, whatever special channel of influence they adopt, aim only to develop, unite, and strengthen the interests which are common to all.

UNITARIANISM CONFOUNDED.

SOME mighty malleus hæreticorum, modestly veiling his illustrious name under the initials "J. H.," who honours Liverpool with his residence, has deigned likewise to honour our last poor Leader with an elaborate notice. With a humility, too, as remarkable as his modesty, he accompanies his notice with the threat, "If you don't print this, I shall send it to an orthodox periodical, to show your dishonesty and determination to suppress inquiry." Surely he must have felt that a production so rare ran no risk of being suppressed. J. H.'s method of writing is, it must be confessed, somewhat original, and requires his notes to be read alongside of our Leader; but those who do this will, we think, be repaid for their pains. The only explanation needed is that the words in italics are those which occur in our Leader, and that we have omitted two short passages, which we venture to think not material:

Ignorance. Yes, as long as you have no creed.

Advanced Churchmen. Yes. Voysey and the Pilgrim and the Shrine may well shrink from you, who to keep a congregation together avoid clear exposition of your real opinions.

Conforming heretics. Oh, yes! Heretics! you are only just escaped from the harrow of persecution, and those who go further than you are heretics!—who, by-the-bye, make up the better half of your congregations.

Most dangerous of heretics. Oh, no danger at all from such prevaricating inmates of the half-way-house to infidelity.

A weakening of allegiance. Oh, yes! print your creed—hang it up in your chapels, and the Sceptics who herd with you would be forced to secede, and then where would the stipends be?

As Unitarians we have a faith. No, you have not, or you would give it us in print; you would hang it in your chancels—such you have in your make-believe churches.

A belief in the Scriptures. No belief at all. Look at your Improved Ver-ion, where the Miraculous Conception, the Woman taken in Adultery, are printed in italics to show that they are apocryphal—lying legends.

Divine sonship of man. Print this and put it over your pulpits, and half your congregations would be dispersed as if by a bombshell.

In Unitarianism we have a reasonable faith. What is it?

Reason supports our belief. No, it does not. You put a big Bible on your pulpit cushion. You make believe that you believe in the Miraculous Conception (you don't acknowledge the Improved Version), the raising of Lazarus, though your J. J. Tayler has thrown doubt on S. John, and in S. John only does this corner-stone miracle appear. . . .

Freedom. Oh, yes; the freedom of no creed, so that a sceptic said to me, "I go to Hope-street Church because I am tied to nothing—I have freedom."

Freshness to our convictions. This is amusing. You have no convictions—v. W. R. Greg, &c. . . .

In Unitarianism we have a faith adapted to the deepest wants of man. Christendom says, No!

It affords a satisfactory solution to the problems. How can it when it is not defined in a creed? You believe that the Gospels are not plenary inspired! Unlike the orthodox, to whom Biblical criticism is an impertinence and a blasphemy, you recognise critical exegesis! Lo! we have J. J. Tayler on S. John, Mr. Greg; in fact, continual outbreaks of scepticism.

Scientific indifference. Ah, true enough, that!

Or to be absorbed in other denominations; and so lose our stipends.

Greater devotion to the congregational life of our body. Oh, yes, keep up the sect, or we shall not get our pay.

We have a Church, let us love it. Oh, yes; and love the ministers, and give them the entrée to rich men's tables.

After this we feel, and our readers will feel with us, there is nothing to be said. Our proper attitude is that of meek submission. Conclusum est. Unitarianism is "shut up."

HENRY CRABB ROBINSON'S "DIARY." XII.

In a letter to his brother, September 15th, 1843, H. C. R. writes: "Miss Atkin gave me a little MS. poem, by Mrs. Barbauld, in answer to one by Hannah More. It is a severe attack on the bishops. Hannah More had, in Bonner's name, affected to abuse the bishops for no longer persecuting heretics. 'Much thanks for little,' say the bishops, in this their answer to Bishop Bonner; 'we would if we could.' The following stanzas contain the pith of the whole:

'Tis not to us should be addressed.

Your ghostly exhortation;

If heresy still lift her crest,

The fault is in the nation.

'The State, in spite of all our pains,

Has left us in the lurch;

The spirit of the times restrains

The spirit of the Church.

'Our spleen against reforming cries

Is now, as ever, shown;

Though we can't blind the nation's eyes,

Still we may shut our own.

'Well warned from what abroad befalls,

We keep all light at home;

Nor brush one cobweb from St. Paul's,

Lest it should shake the dome.

'Would it but please the civil weal

To lift again the crossier,

We soon would make those yokes of steel

Which now are bands of osier.

'Church maxims do not greatly vary,

Take it upon my honour;

Place on the throne another Mary,

We'll find her soon a Bonner.'

In a letter, July 14th, 1844, after he had been reading Dr. Arnold's "Life," Wordsworth says: "He was a truly good man; of too ardent a mind, however, to be always judicious on the great points of secular and ecclesiastical polity that occupied his mind, and upon which he often wrote and acted under strong prejudices and with hazardous confidence. But the book, notwithstanding these objections, must do good, and great good. His benevolence was so earnest, his life so industrious, his affections, domestic and social, so intense, his faith so warm and firm, and his endeavour to regulate his life by it so constant, that his example cannot but be beneficial, even in quarters where his opinions may be most disliked. How he hated sin, and loved and thirsted after holiness! Oh, that on this path he were universally followed!"

Writing to H. C. R., October 21st, 1844, Barron Field says: "I am devouring Baxter's 'Life and Times.' What a liberal though orthodox Christian was he! Why was not the Church reformed by him and the rest of the London ministers at the Restoration? Nothing has been done since, for now nearly 200 years. What a noble passage is the following: 'Therefore I would have had the brethren to have offered the Parliament the Creed, the Lord's Prayer, and the Decalogue alone as our essentials or fundamentals, which at least contain all that is necessary to salvation, and hath been by all the ancient Churches taken for the sum of their religion. And whereas they still said, A Socinian or a Papist will subscribe all this, I answered them, So much the better, and so much the fitter it is to be the matter of our concord. But if you are afraid of communion with Papists and Socinians, it must not be avoided by making a new rule or test of faith which they will not subscribe to, or by forcing others to subscribe to more than they can do, but by calling them to account whenever in preaching or writing they contradict or abuse the truth to which they have subscribed. This is the work of Government, and we must not think to make laws serve instead of judgment and execution; nor must we make new laws as often as heretics will misinterpret and subscribe the old; for, when you have put in all the words you can devise, some heretics will put their own sense on them, and subscribe them. And we must not blame God for not making a law that no man can misinterpret or break, and think to make such a one ourselves, because God could not or would not. These presumptions and errors have divided and distracted the Christian Church, and one would think experience should save us from them.'"

Mr. Robinson used to say that, during his long life, he had never done anything of the slightest use to his fellow-men, except in the cases of the Dissenters' Chapels Act, the Flaxman Gallery, and the establishment of University Hall. Of the first he says, "My interest in this bill rises to anxiety," and in a variety of ways he rendered valuable assistance in obtaining it. Of the debate upon it, he writes, June 6th, 1844: "I went as early as four to the Commons. There I stayed till twelve, when I came home with Cookson. A most interesting debate, but sadly one-sided one. For the bill, Attorney-General [Sir William Follett] admirably luminous. Macaulay eloquent and impressive, but still not quite what I liked—a want of delicacy. Monckton Milnes ingenious and earnest—an unexpected speech. Gladstone historical and elaborate. Shell wild, extravagant, and funny; especially an attack on Sir Robert Inglis. Sir Robert Peel very dignified and conscientious. Lord John Russell—not much in his speech beyond his testimony to the merits of the bill. Contra. Such a set! Not a cheer elicited the whole night. They consisted of Sir Robert Inglis, Plumptre, Colquhoun, and Fox Maule. Lord Sandon spoke, but it is not clear on which side he meant to speak. On the whole it was an evening of very great excitement and pleasure."

On July 6th, he called upon the Bishop of Norwich, Dr. Stanley, about the bill. He says: "He received me with great personal kindness, but said, 'I shall take no part in the measure. I cannot oppose a bill which is to extend religious liberty, but I cannot assist a bill which is to favour Unitarianism.' I gravely said, 'I should have a very bad opinion of any bishop who did.' 'How do you mean that?' he asked. 'Thus, my lord. This bill will merely extend to Unitarians the same protection which all other Protestant Dissenters enjoy. To be relieved from persecution is a great blessing, but surely not a favour.' 'Certainly not. And is that all your bill does?' 'Your lordship shall judge.' I then put into his hands several papers, which, as I was the next day informed, kept him up all night, and ultimately he voted for and spoke in favour of the bill."

Writing to Wordsworth on the same subject, July 24th, he says: "Lord Lyndhurst, and every other law lord, with the concurrence of the Attorney-General (and Mr. Gladstone on High-Church principles), held that it was a monstrous injustice to take from the Unitarians, merely on a law fiction, the property they had held for several generations; that because, before 1813, Unitarianism was not tolerated, therefore it must be inferred that Trinitarianism was intended, the fact being, beyond all contradiction, as Mr. Gladstone asserted, after a long historical investigation, that while the Independents (of William's and Anne's time) inserted in their foundation deeds a formal declaration of their doctrines, the Presbyterians, though the Arian controversy was then carrying on, refused to bind themselves to any faith whatever. In this they acted consistently, as Dissenters (the first principle of Dissent is self-government); and having left the Church because they would not submit to her dictation, neither would they call upon others to submit to theirs. Nor would they deprive themselves of the power to change, if they thought proper."

AMERICAN NOTES.

The Rev. David A. Wasson utters a truth which is getting to need considering when he says, philanthropy may get to be like water that will only run down hill; may come to have a disastrous tendency towards the pots and kettles; may boast, perhaps, of its indifference to all that does not find its true end in the pot-luck of mankind; may sneer, perhaps, at those who persist to concern themselves about "the light that never was on sea or shore." Philanthropy also may lie prone, and preach downwards; and of this style of philanthropy the mischief is greater than that of mere worldliness can be, for of the moral sentiment itself, it makes leaden weights to pull down the lids over the sovereign eye of the race.

After giving the Rev. E. E. Hale's letter on the reasons (hardly sufficient ones, it seems to us) why Mr. Everett, when Minister to this country, did not attend a Unitarian place of worship in London, the Auburn Advertiser says:

"It is not easy to understand why Mr. Everett should have been charged with being ashamed of his religious faith, abroad or at home. He was not the first Minister from this country at the Court of St. James that held the same. The last twenty-five years there have been more of that denomination than any other, including Mr. Everett himself, Abbott Lawrence, the late Minister, Charles Francis Adams, and the present Mr. Motley—and it is the faith of some of the ablest public men in England. He is in as good company at home. A denomination that has furnished the country with four Presidents, with Prescott, Motley, Sparks, Palfrey, and Frothingham as historians; with Bryant, Longfellow, Lowell, Whittier, and Holmes as poets; with John Adams, John Quincy Adams, Daniel Webster, William P. Fessenden, Charles Sumner, and John A. Andrew as statesmen; with a long line of clergymen from Channing to the author of the above note, eminent for piety, learning, intellectual ability, and weight of character, is not one exactly to be ashamed of. What will the Leader say to the fact that three of the six members of Gen. Grant's Cabinet are Unitarians; Secretary of the Treasury Boutwell, of the Interior Cox, and Attorney-General Hoar. Secretary of War Rawlins is a Universalist, so that two-thirds of the Cabinet are Liberal Christians. It is awful to contemplate!"

The Rev. J. F. Clarke, who went West to see the recent great eclipse, writes that the sight was so awful, and yet so intensely interesting, that he, for one, would willingly have gone another 1,200 miles to see the same sight again during another two minutes.

The Liberal Christian tells us that the following lucid scientific explanation of Spiritualism is from a name that "carries weight:"

"Mysterious rappings proceed from the subderangement and hyper-efervescence of small conical glandular bodies situated heterogeneously in the rotunda of the inferior acephalo-cysts; which, by coming in unconscious contact with the etherization of the five superior processes of the dorsal vertebrae, also result in 'tippings,' by giving rise to spontaneous combustions with certain abnormal evacuations of multitudinous echinorhynchus bicornis, situated in various abdominal orifices. The raps occur from the ebullitions of the former in certain temperamental structures; and the tips from the thoracic cartilaginous ducts, whenever their contents are compressed by cerebral inclination."

Dr. Freeman Clarke, who has been luxuriating at a farmhouse on the Upper Mississippi, on deer, grouse, and trout, justifies himself before the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, by saying he did not shoot many birds nor catch many fish. Had his conscience troubled him, it would have been comforted by a sermon he had just heard in a Presbyterian church on recreations, in which the minister said many people who came to him for spiritual comfort needed to be told to take their fishing-tackle rather than their Bible. Instead of being told to pray they ought to be told to play. Dr. Clarke thanked the preacher for his discourse, and was invited to preach, notwithstanding he was known to be a Unitarian. He was also asked to preach for the Methodists at Burlington on the same trip.

Dr. Osgood, after visiting Dr. Dörner of Berlin, writes thus of him:

"Dörner is the pattern of the sacred scholar, and the interviews with him were blessing enough to have repaid the trouble of the journey to Berlin. I had spent many days in the woods of Fairfield over his great prize book on the history of Protestant theology, and now I talked with him face to face. He is a great liberal thinker and a great believer—the best specimen of the Broad Church theologian that I have met in Europe—the most thorough Christian scholar and thinker of our day. His views are somewhat like the liberal Orthodoxy of Dr. Bushnell, but he has far more learning and definiteness. He does not go with the extreme Lutheran ritualists in their adoration of the letter of the Bible and the ordinances of the Church, nor will he be identified with the liberals of the Free Protestant Union, who are for removing all conditions of faith, and throwing open Church-fellowship and suffrage to all who care, or seem to care, for any sort of religion. He thinks their last yearly meeting wild and disgraceful. He considers himself Unitarian and also Trinitarian, and maintains that God is one absolute personality in three modes of being, not merely modes of manifestation; and he regards this as the pure doctrine of Athanasius and the great Fathers of the fourth century. He can say thus with Dean Stanley, that he would no sooner think of calling himself Anti-Trinitarian than Anti-Unitarian; and he wishes to keep clear from all sectarian narrowness, such as afflicts a certain class of limited minds. He professed to have close fellowship with Martensen and Liebhner, with whom he had lately an important conference in Switzerland. He gave me a letter of introduction to Liebhner, whose work on Christ's Nature I knew and prized; but I was surprised to find this champion of what is called the Low Christology so high in position as to be the head of the Lutheran school in Saxony. His leading principle is, that God's being must be so full and perfect that He must have within Himself the object as well as the source of supreme love, and hence he interprets the one God as Father, Son, and Spirit, one absolute personality, with a certain threeeness of life."

Referring to the story which Mrs. Stowe has lately told the world, the New York Tribune says:

"In the Life of Dr. Lyman Beecher [Mrs. Stowe's father], written by his children, that patriarch is reported to have said: 'If Byron could only have talked with Taylor and me, it might have got him out of all his troubles.' People may smile at this as the simplicity of an ardent minister of religion, yet we are by no means sure that Dr. Beecher was wrong, for Byron, like all great poets, was naturally religious, so much so, indeed, that but for his early death he might have lived to be an ascetic, and even bigoted devotee. His infidel opinions, as they are called, were not worthy to be called opinions at all. They were partly reaction from Scotch Calvinism, and partly mere brag and bagatelle."

William and Ellen Crafts, for whose arrest the first fugitive slave-law writ was issued, but who escaped from Boston by the underground railway to Halifax, and thence to this country, where they have since resided, have, we are told, either returned or are on the point of returning to America.

A clergyman at Saratoga wrote home the other day that the dress of a certain lady there was valued at his salary for two years, and that her diamonds were equal in value to the cost of a comfortable mission church, with infants' room attached, gas fixtures and cabinet organ included.

FATHER HYACINTHE.

We throw together a few particulars, gathered from various quarters, respecting the famous French Carmelite preacher, whose recent letter to the Superior of his Order has caused such a sensation, not only in Paris and Rome, but, we may say throughout the Catholic world:

M. Loyson (for that is his secular name) was born at Orleans, in 1827, finished his studies at Pau, and when quite young gained distinction by some poetical compositions which are said to have been very remarkable. When eighteen he entered St. Sulpice, and was ordained after studying there for four years. Soon afterwards he taught philosophy at Avignon, and theology at Nantes. When he had been engaged for ten years in the ministry of the Church of St. Sulpice, belonging, we believe, to the Dominicans, he entered the order of the barefooted Carmelites.

As far back as 1862 his freedom and outspokenness brought upon him the notice of his superiors. In that year, on the initiation of the Society of St. Vincent de Paul, he took the place, in the pulpit of a church at Lyons, of a somewhat famous preacher there who was ill. He confined himself at first entirely within the limits of the instructions given him by his superiors; the commencement of his discourse was cold and unimpassioned, and failed to excite any enthusiasm in his audience; suddenly, however, he followed his own inspiration, and uttered an eloquent apostrophe on the want of brotherly love in his hearers and in the Church, and on the universal selfishness which prevailed in its place. This latter portion of his discourse caused no little surprise, and was the subject of much comment. In a second sermon he announced quite plainly a preference for morality over dogma. "I have wandered over the world," he said, "and have everywhere found only germs of intelligence, and atoms of understanding. I have entered the cloister, and have there only met with abortive saints." The Archbishop of Lyons, Cardinal Bonald, heard this sermon preached, and was highly offended at it. In the first burst of his indignation he sent for the father and forbade him to preach in any church of his diocese. The urgent representations of the highest society in Lyons, however, induced him to withdraw this prohibition. He again sent for the father, and in a mild and forbearing manner put before him the harm he would do to the Church if he went on with his violent attacks upon it. The father could not resist this friendly address, and promised to control himself in future.

In 1864 he appeared as a preacher in Paris, first at the Madeleine and then at Notre Dame, and at once obtained high distinction by his great natural eloquence and the broadness of his views. For the last two years, especially, his sermons have been remarked for the independence and boldness of their tone, and are believed to have drawn upon him the censure of his superiors and of the Holy See. Not long ago he surprised many, and called forth strong protests from others, by grouping together the three religions, the Jewish, the Catholic, and the Protestant, from the point of view of civilisation.

He appears to be of a naturally ardent and impetuous character, and his enemies accuse him of fickleness and mental instability, mainly, as it seems, on the ground of his having, for some reason or other, twice changed his religious order. As might be expected, his vehement denunciation of "Romanism," as distinguished from "Christianity," is peculiarly exasperating to the Ultramontanes; but their cue is to depreciate the importance of the father and his doings, and they represent what has taken place as a mere freak of eccentricity, not to say insanity, and declare that his "revolt," as they call it, is no more than what they have long expected. But the defection of a man whom all Paris crowded to listen to, who had the Archbishop of Paris so often at the head of his audience, absorbed in what he said, and whose eloquence made such an evident impression on the intelligent working-men whom he drew around him as often as he appeared in the pulpit, cannot but be deeply felt. The Bishop of Orleans indeed, in a letter to him says, "You can measure by the grief of all the friends of the Church, and the joy of all her enemies, the evil you have done."

On quitting his convent at Passy, where he had lived for five years, he retired to the home of a member of his family, where, it was said, he intended to await the decision of the Ecumenical Council, in which it is thought that not a few will sympathise in his views, before again appearing in public; but the latest account from Paris states that a letter has been sent to him by the General Superior of the Carmelites, ordering him to return to his convent in ten days, under penalty of major excommunication, and of a note being issued declaring him to be dishonoured in the eyes of the Church. It remains to be seen whether he has anything of the spirit of Luther in him or not.

GOING HOME.

BY J. C. HAGEN.

'Tis fifty years to-day, Kate,
Since you and I were wed,
And people call us old now,
So many years have fled.
But O, we are no older now
Than on that glorious day,
Though in our journey homeward
We are further on the way.
Though there be those who number not
So many years as we,
And tread the earth with firmer step,
May younger seem to be,
The years are only mile-stones set
To mark the pilgrim's way;
O, no, we are not older, but
We're nearer home than they!
And though our limbs have weary grown,
From journeying so long,
Our spirits still are fresh and young,
Our hearts are brave and strong.
The spirit feels no lapse of years,
The soul knows no decay;
O, no, we are not older, but
We're further on the way.
When on life's journey, lovingly,
Together we set out,
The world was all before us, Kate,
And brighter seemed, no doubt;
But we've had our share of blessings,
As we journeyed on our way,
And our heavenly hopes grow brighter
As our earthly ones decay.
The truest and the fondest friends
Already have passed on,
And say, should it not gladden us
To go where they have gone?
And when the home we shall have reached
To which they've gone before,
We'll find them there to welcome us,
All waiting at the door.

THOUGH we last week gave a description of the performance of the St. Januarius "miracle," a correspondent of the Pall Mall sets the thing before us in so lively a manner, that we cannot refrain from taking the following extracts from his letter.

By a quarter to nine, he says, we were safe in the sacristy of the chapel of San Gennaro. This is a kind of foyer or green-room to the great theatre inside; and very like a foyer it was. There was a considerable crowd: ladies sitting and chatting with clever-looking young ecclesiastics; a layman here and there; three English forestieri looking very much out of their element, but determined to get the best places; priests robing for the mass; other priests of all grades and ages, in black frocks and white jackets, perfect marvels of the washing and crimping arts, helping them to robe, or rinsing out the vessels just used, or lounging about doing nothing particular; a Greek bishop in purple; a German canonist with a band of priests from Salzburg; a monk or two barefooted and cowed; every one taking snuff more or less; and through these motly elements, every two or three minutes would arrive a priest from the church in his cope with the covered chalice in his hands, murmuring as he went the concluding words of the office. Presently, in black vestments and coloured stole, walked in a tall, dry, upright, collected-looking priest in spectacles, whose profile strongly reminded me of the great John Henry Newman. It was the Archbishop's Treasurer, and a Cavaliere of the order of San Gennaro. He was to be, so to speak, the worker of the coming "miracle," and to him we were presented by the cardinal's servant. "Stick to me," said he; "nothing can be done till I am there, so you will be in plenty of time." Next arrived a short, thickest, important-looking, not to say fussy man, in a dress coat and coloured trousers, and a green ribbon at his button-hole,—Maestro Guidici, the representative of the city authorities. These two have possession of the four keys necessary to unlock the closet which contains the famous "blood."

Every one now edges nearer the passage that leads to the chapel, and the experienced can foresee that a crush is coming. And a sharper crush, for the time, I don't remember ever to have felt. Through a crooked passage, through a doorway with projecting jambs, over some altar steps, against a very sharp bronze gate, and at last we shot out into the body of the chapel itself, between a file of bayonets which kept whisking and poking about unpleasantly near one's face. "Well," said a priest close to our party, in charge of some ladies, "this is miracle number one, and well performed too!" We hurried on till we found ourselves on the steps of the high altar, almost as closely beset as we had been a minute before. It is a cheerful-looking building, the chapel of St. Gennaro, wide, lofty, and open, with plenty of light, and gay with gilding and pictures, and bright brass gates. How full it was! There was not an inch of room to spare anywhere. It was packed up to the altar rails. Close outside these were a number of oldish women, more or less ugly, who go under the name of the "relations" of the saint, and are almost as necessary to the miracle as the Cavaliere or the Deputy. We look at them and the crowd generally, and then at the altar—a marvel of carved solid silver-work, in the worst taste—and then have a lively quarrel with a hot Italian gentleman, who, because we won't go down from the step we are on, accuses us of trying to get up a step higher. But these pleasantries are suddenly interrupted by one of the most horrid noises ever heard. It comes from the women just mentioned, and is exactly like the croaking of innumerable gigantic frogs. "Gloria Patri et Filio et Spiritui Sancto, et nunc et semper, et in secula seculorum, Amen," are the words they croak, over and over again, with a curious harshness quite indescribable. We look over our shoulder, and see a procession coming along between the bayonets, bearing a rich red mitre and an equally rich cope. The Cavaliere and the Deputy are part of it—the latter with a red embroidered bag in his hand and looking more important than ever. But the Cavaliere was a rock, whom nothing could move. They went behind the altar and presently reappeared on our left with a great many lighted candles, and a full-sized gilt bust of San Gennaro, who was hoisted on to the altar, and his old mitre and cope being taken off he was dressed in the fresh ones, and made nice and comfortable. Another pause, and then again appeared our two friends, this time at our end of the altar, the Cavaliere with something wrapped in the bosom of his vestment, and with an assistant priest carrying a lighted candle in a little flat china candlestick—the Deputy with his red bag.

The Cavaliere was a man of business; he lost no time; he stood upright in front of the altar, and held before him, and before us, what looked just like a small circular silver carriage-lamp, with a crown at the top and a shank at the bottom. This was the reliquary containing the "blood of St. Januarius." Every one knelt, and the women set up a fiercer clamour than before. But I determined that nothing should take off my attention from the reliquary and the keeper thereof. He first turned to the Deputy, who was kneeling on a cushion close to the altar-front, and brought the reliquary close to his face, while the attendant priest held the candle at the back, so that he could see through it. I, being close to the Deputy, could see that between the two glasses which form the sides of the carriage-lamp there were two dark bodies, and from what I knew before I was aware that one of these contained the substance the liquefaction of which I had come to behold. It is a round bottle not quite globular, but nearly so, with a neck, and a sort of glass frill on the neck, capable of holding about a wine glass full and a half, and the substance stands in it about three parts up. The other bottle is a straight "phial" and contains nothing but a few spots or splashes, the remnants of blood which once was there, but was stolen by a king of Spain or some other royal thief. Having convinced the Deputy that the blood is solid—"è duro"—the Cavaliere addresses himself to the business of the day. He begins turning the reliquary round and round, holding it first with the crown uppermost and then with the shank, always presenting it towards us who are in front and on each side of him, and always with the candle behind. Five minutes pass thus, and no change in the bottle! Then they both turn to the altar; the attendant sets down the candle and begins to repeat some words out of a book, the Cavaliere—always with his hand on his charge—repeating after him, and the other priests near repeating too. In a moment the croaking from below begins, louder than ever—"Gloria Patri," &c., "Aiutaci" (help us), and other words I could not make out—a clamour enough to deafen one. Two or three minutes pass in this way, and then they face round again, and recommence the turnings and twistings. At length, at the end of six minutes from the outset (which, but for my watch, I should have said was at least half an hour), the line of the surface in the bottle is seen to shift as it is turned—ever so little, but still it moves. "Comincia," exclaims some one; the Deputy, on its being shown to him, confirms it; the Cavaliere waves a handkerchief; some one from below throws up rose leaves all over us; we hear the noise of wings, and a dozen sparrows or larks dash up towards the window above; everybody moves and murmurs with relief, and the organ strikes up a hymn, which lasts through many verses, and in which the old women exercise their harsh voices to more advantage than before.

But, whatever others may be, the Cavaliere is not disturbed; he has his business to do, and he does it nobly. Looking at no one in particular, but out into the general distance, he continues turning and holding and wiping for some little time, always with the same imperturbable composure. Five minutes more solves the question of the liquefaction. It is again shown to the Deputy, with great deliberation; and then he kisses it with an Eastern manner, not merely once in our cold northern fashion, but first a kiss, then a touch on the forehead, and then a second kiss. He then takes his red bag and retires. The kissing then begins with us all, in this way:—The Cavaliere and his assistant came opposite me; first he wiped the glass of the carriage lamp next me, and then put it close to my eyes, so that with the candle behind I could see through. There lay the bottles in their ancient, dingy nest, the grey one on the left, the tawny one on the right; it was like looking into some forbidden place, and had a spice of that delicious pleasure. Then he turned them upside down, and I saw the fluid going round in the bottle, and the undissolved core breaking the line of the top; but the glass remained of its old grey colour—no tint of blood or anything like it; and the substance was quite opaque. Not even at the edges was there any dawn of red, and it moved quite sluggishly as if unwilling that its rest should thus be broken. Then I gave a glance to the phial, tawny with blotches of dark reddish brown, and thought for the moment that I saw the blotches sliding down: and then it was all moved on from me to the next kneeler, and to the next, till six or eight of us had so seen it. Then he held it to us again one by one to kiss.

I don't believe it to be heat which causes the liquefaction. The atmosphere was certainly warm—ninety degrees said the exact man of our party who kept the thermometer; but it would take longer than six minutes for that degree of heat in the air to raise the temperature of a substance confined in a bottle inside a close box—to any appreciable extent. Had I found myself a casual spectator of the scene, I think my impression would have been that it was the shaking—the continual reversing—that did it. But then some chemist must tell me if blood or any other substance will turn from solid to fluid by such a process, and then when left to rest become solid again. Blood or not, of course I cannot believe in the "miracle." Even if miracles were possible at this day they surely involve some motive or reason, and are not to be worked in the same mechanical fashion that one turns a coffee mill.

But to return to my Cavaliere: when he had administered the relic to all within the altar-rails—perhaps a hundred in all—his work was done. It had not occupied him quite an hour, but for the time it was severe. To turn a tolerably heavy metal case over and over for an hour, without stopping, in the midst of a crowd of hot perspiring people, was enough to tell even upon that cool imperturbable frame, and before he left I saw more than traces of perspiration on his spare smooth cheek. I found him afterwards in the sacristy, looking rather fagged. Honour to him! he had his work to do and he did it. Before going he and his assistant handed over the reliquary and candle to a second pair of priests, one of whom attached it to a stout guard round his neck and then proceeded through the church to offer it to the kisses of the crowd.

A LESSON FROM VELOCIPEDES.

Mr. Spurgeon has turned the velocipede to use in the pulpit. In a recent sermon he said, "These new inventions which the lads are riding up and down our streets will not keep up unless they are kept going; the moment they stop they fall down. And in this they are exceedingly like the Christian Church, which falls unless it is kept constantly moving on."

A 'CUTE CHILD.

A STORY is told of a child who was admitted the other day to the private study of the Pope, which shows that Young Rome is not without sharpness. In preparation for the Ecumenical Council, his Holiness ordered from his architect certain embellishments, the plan of which was brought for his inspection by that gentleman's little boy. Charmed by the plan, his Holiness opened a drawer full of gold, and said to the child, "Take a handful of coins as a reward for the beauty of your father's work." "Holy Father," replied the child, "take it out for me, your hand is bigger than mine."

KISSING THE BABY.

A WRITER in Appleton's Journal (U.S.) says, it was once his lot to dwell in the white tents of Camp Harrison, in Georgia—in that lower part of the State where families are always far between, and much more so in war times. For long weeks we had not seen a woman or a child. At last, the railroad through the camp was repaired, and in the first train there was a lady with a wide-awake, kicking baby. Some hundreds of rough soldiers were round the cars, and Captain Story, of the Fifth-seventh Infantry, was the biggest and roughest among them, if we judge of the tree by its bark. The lady, with the baby in her arms, was looking from the window, and he took off his hat and said, "Madam, I will give you five dollars if you will let me kiss that baby." One look at his bearded face told her there was nothing bad in it, and, saying with a pleased laugh, "I do not charge anything for kissing my baby," it was handed over. The little one was not afraid, and the bushy whiskers, an eighth of an ell long, were just the playhouse it had been looking for. More than one kiss did the captain get from the little red lips, and there was energy in the hug of the little arms. Then other voices said, "Pass him over, Cap.," and before the train was ready to move, half a hundred had kissed the baby. It was on its best behaviour, and kicked, and crowed, and tugged at whiskers, as only a happy baby can. It was an event in the campaign; and one giant of a mountaineer as he strode past us with tread like a mammoth, but with tear-dimmed eyes and quivering lips, said, "By George, it makes me feel and act like a fool; but I've got one just like it at home."

INTELLIGENCE.

GELLYONEN.—The South Wales Unitarian Society held its quarterly meetings at the above place of worship on Wednesday and Thursday, 29th and 30th ult. There was a good number of ministers present. Sermons were delivered on Wednesday afternoon by the Revs. R. J. Jones, M.A., Aberdare, and E. W. Lloyd, Cwmabach; and in the evening, by the Revs. W. Rees, Rhdydwyn, and W. Thomas, M.A., Llwyn. On Thursday morning, the Rev. E. Higginson, Swansea, delivered a discourse on "Mystery," as found in the Scriptures. His remarks were very plain, and couched in terms easy to be understood by those whose acquirements in the English language were limited. A necessary thing here. After him came the Rev. Thomas Thomas, Pantydaifod, the appointed preacher, who delivered an eloquent discourse from Acts xvii., 23 to 25. He treated his subject fully and well, and we hope, convincingly. The Conference subject of discussion, which was proposed three months previously was, "What is Revelation." The Revs. E. W. Lloyd and D. Edwards (Baptist) briefly spoke and agreed, that it was the revealing supernatural of truths, that were previously unknown, and could not otherwise be known. The Rev. W. Thomas held that it could be reduced under the laws of the mind, that the revelation of the New Testament is just of the same nature as that which has been revealed in science and literature by Newton and Shakespeare, &c. The Rev. Professor Evans, Carmarthen College, rose and stoutly opposed this sentiment holding with the previous speakers that the revelation of the New Testament was purely supernatural. The Rev. R. J. Jones said a few words, endeavouring to reconcile the sentiments of those that differed.—A cold collation was served up in the vestry room adjoining the chapel for the ministers and friends from a distance. By three p.m. the old chapel was full again (it being indeed a very large one in such a mountainous district) of attentive hearers of the word of God. The Revs. D. L. Evans and Titus Lloyd, of Nottage, delivered highly instructive and effective sermons. Thus the meetings terminated.

GLASGOW.—A soiree in connection with St. Vincent street Unitarian Church was held in the Merchants' Hall, on Monday evening, to welcome the Rev. J. Page Hopps, as their pastor. Mr. William Teacher presided, and the hall was completely filled. After tea the chairman remarked that Mr. Hopps had proved himself an able and zealous labourer elsewhere. Mr. William Rankin then, in the name of the ladies, presented him with a pulpit gown. Mr. Ivie Mackie (Auchencrain) in addressing the meeting, observed that he had known Mr. Hopps for a number of years, and had watched his progress in Lancashire and Cheshire, and he could safely say that there was not a more able man in connection with the Unitarian body. Mr. Hopps, who was warmly greeted, sincerely thanked his friends for their kindness. The meeting was afterwards addressed by other friends, and enlivened by music given by the church choir.

MANCHESTER: LOWER MOSLEY-STREET SCHOOLS. The first meeting for the session 1869-70 of the Mutual Improvement Society was held on Saturday evening, when about 180 members and friends were present. After tea, the Rev. Joseph Freeston and Mr. Jesse Filcher having addressed the meeting, Mr. George Smith (the President) delivered the inaugural address. The remainder of the evening was devoted to music, readings, &c.

ROCHDALE-ROAD DOMESTIC MISSION.—The annual Band of Hope tea-party was held last Monday evening, when about ninety children sat down to tea, after which the Rev. B. Walker presided. The meeting, which was the largest held since the minister entered on his duties—there being about 300 children present, besides adults—was addressed by Mr. Thomas Wright, the prison philanthropist, E. Hodgson, Esq., and Mr. M. Ridgway. Recitations were given, and the juvenile choir, under Mr. Bradley, the schoolmaster, enlivened the evening's proceedings by singing. On the whole, the meeting was of a very encouraging kind.

STRANGEWAYS.—The annual festival of the Band of Hope connected with the Unitarian Free Church, was held on the 27th ult. After tea, the Rev. D. Kerry of Mossley, presided, and made an effective speech on the evils of the drink traffic, and in favour of abstinence. During the evening a presentation was made by Mr. Johnson, president, on behalf of the committee, to Mr. Frederick Ashton, the secretary, who is leaving to pursue his studies at Oxford for the ministry. The offering consisted of a large photograph, framed and glazed, of fourteen ladies and gentlemen, officers of the society, and on behalf of the juvenile choir (trained by Mr. Ashton) a handsome pocket Bible. Mr. Ashton, in acknowledging the gifts, spoke of the good influences of such societies, and thanked the donors for these proofs of their regard.

NANTWICH.—Last Tuesday a tea party was held at the Chapel, mainly intended for the Sunday scholars and their parents. With the addition of some members of the congregation, and a considerable proportion of strangers, upwards of 200 assembled. After tea, the meeting was addressed by the minister, the Rev. J. Macdonald, Mr. Dean, of the Nantwich and Crewe Guardian; Messrs. J. Briggs, and P. Barker. The remainder of the evening was filled up with recitations by the scholars, and readings and songs by others. The interest of the meeting was well sustained, and concluded with a hymn and prayer.—This week an adult week evening class has been commenced. Though the Sunday school has been open only six months, there are seventy scholars on the books, and the number grows from week to week. New members are added to the congregation, and the increased energy and organisation now existing make the prospect of the cause a cheering one.

PUDSEY.—On Sunday, the 27th ult., the anniversary sermons were preached, in the morning and evening, by Mr. George Lucas, of Gateshead, and in the afternoon by the Rev. John Bevan. The congregations were large and the collections good.

STRATFORD, ESSEX.—The Sunday afternoon meetings for religious conversation, conducted by the Rev. Thomas Crow, have just been resumed at the Working Men's Hall. The inaugural tea party and conversazione took place on Wednesday, the 29th ult., when a very respectable company, including most of the leading Unitarians and several members of the Orthodox Church in the town, spent a pleasant evening, chiefly in considering the "benefits to be derived from meetings for religious conversation," which had been announced as the subject to be discussed. The chairman stated that, having in the last winter had most of the great doctrinal questions of present interest under review, it was intended during the coming winter to give these meetings a more directly practical aim. A letter was read from Samuel Sharpe, Esq., expressing earnest sympathy with this movement, and announcing the presentation of some volumes of suitable books for the library.

A CORRECTION.

To the Editors.—In your report of the recent meeting of the Bolton District Unitarian Association at Hindley, I am stated to have "expressed a hope that Mr. Martineau and Mr. James Drummond will be found well fitted to fill the important offices left vacant by Mr. Taylor's death." A more correct report of what was said is given in the Bolton Chronicle, viz., "Mr. Carter expressed his gratification that by the appointment of the Rev. James Martineau to the principalship, and that of the Rev. James Drummond to the professorship of theology, able successors had been found to the deceased gentleman."—Yours truly,

HELP NEEDED IN A GOOD WORK.

To the Editors.—Will you permit me, through your columns, to ask the personal aid of any lady or gentleman who is disposed to assist in a good work? Connected with the Carter-lane Mission, Friar-street, Doctors' Commons, is an evening school, in which girls of twelve years of age and upwards are instructed by voluntary teachers in reading, writing, and arithmetic, on two evenings in the week—viz., Tuesday and Thursday. It is feared that the work of this useful institution must be curtailed unless more labourers will enter the field, as the present staff of teachers is insufficient for the growing needs of the school.—Yours, &c.,

ON THEIR OWN MERITS,

The WINES OF HUNGARY are good, useful, Wines, without roosting upon them, as has been too much the case, a reputation and character beyond their INTRINSIC QUALITIES. There is sufficient diversity of taste in a large population to ensure for the Wines a fair trial and a regular market; and it is fairer to place them well before the public, and let them stand the test of comparison with those of other countries. In the long run this will be best for the interests of the Wines themselves, as they are really good, sound Wines. Perhaps the quality most in demand, and MUCH RECOMMENDED by doctors, is

CARLOWITZ,

WHICH WE OFFER AT 2s. PER DOZEN, and ask comparison with the HIGHEST PRICED quality of LONDON HOUSES. We may remark that we were among the VERY FIRST who brought Wines from Hungary seven years ago.

WHAT THE CHURCHES ARE DOING.

Another colony has finally given up the principle of Church and State connection. A telegram from Melbourne announces that the Legislative Assembly of Victoria has resolved to abolish the State-aid grant in five years, diminishing the amount by £10,000 each year.

Remarking on the departure of Father Hyacinthe for America, Figaro says that he belongs to an unfrocked family. He himself was first a Sulpician, then a Dominican, and afterwards a Carmelite; his brother commenced life as a Dominican, and laid aside his habit for a professorship at the Sorbonne; his sister, who was also a Carmelite, left her convent, and now resides on the Boulevard de Neuilly.

According to the Roman correspondent of the Pall Mall, there is no truth in the statement, made by the French journals, that the Pope has addressed a letter to the refractory Carmelite, exhorting him to retract his now famous epistle, and submit to the general of his order. The Holy Father has preserved an absolute silence on the subject. He shows, indeed, that he is not pleased at the interference of the Bishop of Orleans whose letter to Père Hyacinthe has given almost as much offence at the Vatican as the one it condemns. The allusions to Father Lacordaire and Father Ravignan have infuriated the Jesuits, and they are again trying to get the bishop's observations on the Syllabus and the Encyclical put on the Index. The Osservatore Romano is forbidden to insert the bishop's letter; and it is remarked that neither the Osservatore, nor the Giornale di Roma, nor even the Civiltà Cattolica, has said a word about Father Hyacinthe, so completely does the Pontifical Government ignore topics which it knows to be in every mouth.

We learn from the Jewish Chronicle that, at the instance of the board of deputies of British Jews, Sir Moses Montefiore has consented to undertake a journey to the continent, in order to confer personally with Prince Charles of Roumania, and bespeak his Highness's favourable consideration on behalf of the Roumanian Jews.

The Westminster Gazette (R. C.) informs us that the ex-Queen of Spain has serious thoughts of retiring from the gaieties of Parisian life. The Gaulois states that her Majesty has bought a little property near Gonesse, in the department of the Seine-et-Oise, where Sister Patrocino and a score of nuns are going to set up an establishment. The original landlord of the property is said to have been a retired rag-picker of Paris, who has gone to his native town to enjoy his otium cum dignitate.

Priests are flocking into Rome from all quarters, and next month it will be flooded with bishops. The Pope is receiving many presents of provisions for their consumption. The Catholics of Martinique have sent a quantity of coffee, and a large gift of wine is on its way from France.

Bishop Ullathorne, of Birmingham, has issued a pastoral letter to his flock on the subject of the Ecumenical Council, in which he cautions them against believing the reports and speculations which will be rife during its sitting, and recommends them to wait the publication of official documents. "Such documents will probably appear at intervals, and after the Council is concluded will be the time to know what work it has accomplished for God's glory and the service of the Church." In conclusion, he asks for the prayers of the faithful and their offerings to assist in defraying the extraordinary expenses which the Pope incurs by the holding of the Council.

We regret to learn that the Rev. F. D. Maurice has been obliged to resign his living in London on account of impaired health. The Pall Mall hopes, and we share the hope, that the opposition excited by Dr. Temple's elevation will not make Mr. Gladstone lose sight of the opportunity which the vacancy in the deanery of Ely affords for the bestowal of a well-deserved reward.

As the English Independent says, "Church-rates are very hard to kill." For non-payment of these nearly 150 ratepayers of All Saints, Poplar, were summoned before the magistrates the other day. This parish, it seems, has a local Act, under which a sum of £2,000 or more has been annually raised, chiefly for ecclesiastical purposes. The ratepayers supposing that, as Mr. Gladstone's Act expressly puts an end by name to compulsory Church-rates, the Legislature really intended that they should exist no longer, refused to pay, and, being summoned en masse, they called Mr. Bennett, of Serjeants' Inn, to their aid. The magistrates at first refused to listen to anything the objectors had to say; without even requiring the churchwardens to prove the making of the rate, without any proper information or a line of evidence, they were about to make summary orders for payment. Luckily for them there were some present who understood their duty better than they did themselves, and they were at last, and with much difficulty, made to understand that the rate was totally illegal, and that every distress made under their authority would subject them to an action for trespass. They then adjourned the matter, and most likely nothing more will be heard of it. But, as the Independent says, this case should be a warning to Nonconformists throughout the country. There is no saying what audacious churchwardens will not attempt, or ignorant magistrates not sanction. Levies under local Acts should be very carefully scrutinised. No rates of any kind for ecclesiastical purposes are legal now.

A granite monument to the memory of Dr. Robert Vaughan has been erected over his grave in the Torquay Cemetery, bearing this inscription:

"In memory of Robert Vaughan, D.D., formerly Professor of History in the University of London; President of the Lancashire Independent College; Founder, and for many years Editor, of the British Quarterly Review; and successively the minister of Congregational churches in Worcester, Kensington, and Torquay. From the midst of faithful and life-long service for Christ he was called to the rest of the blessed on the 15th of June, 1868, aged 73 years. Erected by friends who honoured his life and deplore his death."

Judging by their conduct, one might sometimes be tempted to think that the clergy of the Establishment were really desirous of helping forward the cause of Dissent. The Vicar of Elmstone Hard-wike, near Cheltenham, for instance, has been doing something in this direction. Mr. C. Corbett, a well-to-do farmer, belonging to the Wesleyan body, having lost a child wished to have it buried in the churchyard, where his wife's relatives were interred, and made the necessary arrangements with the sexton. This official, however, after applying to the Rev. J. Byron, the vicar, told Mr. Corbett that that gentleman refused to bury the child, giving his reason that it had not been baptised in the Church. Mr. Corbett sought an interview with the vicar, and, in his absence, with the Rev. W. Boyce, the curate. The latter gentleman first consented, then retracted, and afterwards consented again. The result of this vacillation was that the burial was delayed several days. Mr. Corbett subsequently wrote to the bishop of the diocese, and received a reply in which several legal extracts were enclosed, to the effect that burial cannot be refused except in the case of persons who have been pronounced excommunicate "for some grievous and notorious crime." On receipt of this note, Mr. Corbett addressed Mr. Byron requesting some acknowledgment of his error and unkindness, but no reply has been vouchsafed.

The "Coupar-Angus Heresy Case," has passed into a new phase. The question at issue was, it will be remembered, whether the Free Church authorities had a right to establish themselves into an inquisition of conscience, and subject any member of the body to compulsory examination as to his opinions on any subject on which from general rumour he was suspected of being heretical. The Presbytery has now unanimously approved the action of the Kirk session of Coupar-Angus, and declared the conduct of the two Free Churchmen, in refusing to submit to the inquisition, to be "contrary to the Word of God, inconsistent with the rule of the Church and the relationship which subsists between a Kirk session and the members of the congregation." We wonder how long men will lie patiently down under tyranny such as this.

The last vacancy among the bishops has been filled up by the appointment of Dr. Harvey Goodwin, Dean of Ely, to the see of Carlisle. He is a learned and able man, having graduated in 1840 as second wrangler and Smith's prizeman. At on time he was claimed as belonging to the Broad party in the Establishment, but since his promotion he has shown a leaning towards a more conservative theology, and would be best described, perhaps, as "a sound Churchman."

In reply to a memorial from the clergy of West Cornwall, praying for a division of the diocese of Exeter, Mr. Gladstone says he will not fail to bring the subject before his colleagues. "The new bishop (he adds), you may rely upon it, will not place any undue obstacle in the way of the division of the diocese. But there are other difficulties. The funds of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners are all appropriated, I believe, by Parliament. Local contributions might, perhaps, be deemed necessary as a proof of local desire. And lastly, the mind of the Church, so to speak, does not seem to be clearly made up on the question what should be the status of new bishops."

The annual meeting of the Congregational Union of England and Wales was opened at Wolverhampton on Tuesday, when the inaugural address was delivered by the Chairman, the Rev. R. W. Dale, of Birmingham. We must reserve our notice of the proceedings of the Union till next week.

On Wednesday a meeting was held in London of clergy and laity favourable to the movement for opposing Dr. Temple's appointment to Exeter. About 200 were present, the majority of whom belonged to the Low Church party. A committee was appointed, among the names on which were those of the Deans of St. Paul's, York, Carlisle, Ripon, and Gloucester, and Archdeacon Denison; and although Lord Shaftesbury had written to the Record to say he thinks it better that the two parties should act separately, it was decided to ask him to be the chairman and Dr. Pusey the vice-chairman.

WHAT IS SAYING ON CHURCH MATTERS.

The Weekly Register (R.C.) declares that a petition, signed by "a very large body" of clergymen of the Church of England, will be presented to the Council of the Vatican, praying that in the event of the Council deciding against the validity of Anglican orders, the petitioners "should be received into the Catholic Church, ordained as priests, employed as such, and allowed, if married, to continue so until the death of their present wives—those married not to be employed as confessors." Many of the English Catholic bishops are said to be favourable to the petition; and the Weekly Register assumes that a favourable decision on the part of the Council would be followed by the secession of "an immense body of the very best men amongst the Anglican clergy."

The same journal publishes a letter respecting the Council from "as high an authority as could be named, always excepting the Holy Father himself," which appears to have been written for the special enlightenment of "the good people of England, Catholics as well as others," and to allay any apprehensions which may be felt as to the probable character of the decrees of the Council. The writer "thinks he may safely say" that the question of the infallibility of the Pope when speaking ex cathedra "will neither be raised nor discussed," but will be left, as at present, one of those matters in which Catholics will be free to hold with one side or the other. He is further "quite certain" that "ultra doctrines or ultra opinions will not be mooted or pushed, or agitated in any way." We confess we are inclined to think that the Civiltà Cattolica is more in the secrets of the Vatican than the Weekly Register's correspondent, and its statements certainly lead us to believe that very ultra doctrines will be mooted and pushed.

"In these times of free thought," the Watchman says, "there is little danger of Methodists departing from the old landmarks. Once a year every minister is challenged as to his continued adherence to those forms of doctrine and discipline, the acceptance of which was the condition of his admission to the Methodist ministry; and no man can evade that challenge without compromising his honour and tampering with his conscience." We quite agree with the Watchman that "with Wesleyan ministers theological tests are a serious reality;" but we have some doubts how far they are consistent with Christian liberty and independence.

The Pall Mall thinks there can be very little doubt that of all the changes which could advance Liberalism in general, none would be half so important or far-reaching as the growth of a Liberal party in the Church of Rome itself. If such a party became really powerful, it would be forced by the nature of the case and by the power of logic to give up all the most important and characteristic Roman doctrines, and would ultimately develop itself into a creed hardly distinguishable for practical purposes from mild English High Churchmanship. It would not, of course, be true, but neither would it be more false than many other creeds, and it would in a variety of ways be greatly less objectionable than the furious theories which are now so eagerly advanced by the zealots of whom Dr. Manning is in this country the best known representative.

Pointing out the sort of ground which a liberal Catholic might take in opposition to the pretensions of the Ultramontane party, headed by the Pope and the Jesuits, the same paper says:

"It is matter of common notoriety, and it is not even denied by the most audacious of Jesuits, that the doctrines about the Pope and the Virgin Mary now put forward so strenuously are not at present and never yet have been amongst the number of the doctrines which Roman Catholics are bound to believe. It is as certain as any such fact can be that the history of them can be traced: that they originated long after the time of Christ and the Apostles, that they were developed in the schools and by theological writers by slow degrees, and that the claim on the part of the Pope and his Council to erect them into articles of faith is in substance, under whatever thin disguises it may be veiled, nothing less than a claim to supreme legislative as well as judicial power over the consciences of men. It is a claim on the part of the Pope to make laws under the pretence of declaring traditions, and to make laws not merely as to what shall be done and thought, but as to what shall be and shall have been. If the Pope makes the doctrine that Mary was taken up bodily into heaven an article of faith, that can only be because he has power to make retrospective declarations as to matters of fact binding as laws upon the consciences of the whole Christian world, than which it would be scarcely less absurd to claim the power of altering facts after they have happened; for what difference is there after all between declaring that all mankind are bound, under pain of damnation, to believe your account of a matter of fact about which you have no special knowledge or means of knowledge, and declaring that you have the power to enact that at a given place and time such a transaction did actually occur?"

In addressing the Leeds Church Institute last week, the bold Archdeacon of Taunton said:

"The British people had for the first time in their history formally declared by the act of a united Legislature that forms of faith were from a national point of view indifferent things. But they had done more; they had dispossessed that particular form of faith which three hundred years ago they established as a national faith. That he called the revolution of 1869. There had been other revolutions, many of them full of blood; but there had never been one greater, more unprincipled, or more full of evil issues than the revolution of 1869. The principle of a national church, he maintained, had been finally destroyed for England. There might perhaps be no immediate prospect of disestablishment for England, or even for Wales; but every one thought so with respect to the Irish Church two years ago, and even Mr. Gladstone himself thought so three years ago. There might be many prevailing political and social reasons against it just now, but all such things made no real difference at all in respect of the ultimate issue. He had always been ready to fight for Church and State, but how was it possible to fight for a thing which had been taken away? He had no belief that the connection between Church and State would ever be recovered for the English people."

The Saturday Review, remarking on the recent creation of so large a batch of baronets, says, it would be conceded on all hands that it would be desirable and fair to have the English Nonconformists better represented in the peers than they are now. But if a minister makes a Nonconformist peer he will almost inevitably, by a mere stroke of his pen, alter the new peer's religious creed. The new peer will be above going to chapel, and at any rate the honourable masters and misses, his children, will not demean themselves by doing anything so unfashionable. English dissent is so much a matter of class and social position that it fades away when the class and social position are changed. A baronetcy comes, therefore, as a relief and means of escape to all parties under the circumstances, and a Jew, a Unitarian, or a Baptist likes that he and the other votaries of an unfashionable creed should have so much honour done them, while they see little danger in accepting it. In days when great wealth is found outside the landed families, and when Nonconformity is a real power in the State, an honour appropriate to rich new men and to Nonconformists is most useful, and a minister, far from undermining, really strengthens the aristocracy by honouring and contenting these important classes.

The English Churchman thus exposes a clerical delinquent—far too mildly, no doubt, many of his brethren will think:

"The same day that his bishop (Lincoln) was in the very neighbourhood, the Rev. Henry Wright, rector of St. Nicholas, Nottingham, "engaged in prayer" at the laying of the first stone of a Presbyterian chapel in Goldsmith-street!"

Commenting on the Coupar-Angus case, the Pall Mall says:

"It is clear that the Presbyterians in Scotland—for both the Established and Dissenting Churches are in this matter in the same boat—must before very long make up their minds either to define what they do believe, or to allow each member liberty to believe for himself. Nobody can dispute their right, if they choose to exercise it, to declare in distinct language the indispensable conditions of Christian membership. Only when they begin to do so it is quite certain they will have to abandon the Confession of Faith; for there is probably not one man in a hundred in all the churches who, if the propositions of that treatise were put to him one by one, could say that he accepts them all. When, therefore, the question arises how a new confession is to be arranged or compiled it is easy to see how desperate will be the conflicts that will arise. But if these are to be avoided there is only one course open. The Church must make no inquiry into the doctrines of its members. It cannot insist upon a belief without defining what it is. The honest way would be to declare explicitly that it asks no distinct profession of any one, and it opens its arms to all who feel disposed to accept the embrace. This obviously need not prevent the rejection, if that is thought desirable, of an open evil-liver. Facts of conduct are easily discriminated, though shades of belief are not. Abandoning the right of inquisition into the mind, the Church would lose nothing of its real influence on the conscience nor of its hold on the affections. But so bold and Christian a course is not to be looked for yet from any Church. What will happen in Scotland will probably be what happens in England. The Church will retain a nominal creed, in which it will assume that all its members concur, being perfectly aware all the time that it dare not put the question; since, if it did, the answer of the majority would disclose that there was no unanimity of belief at all."

At the meeting of the Church Association, held at Bristol last week, the Evangelical clergy seem, some of them, to have indulged in rather strong language respecting their High Church brethren. The Rev. C. H. Davis, for instance, inveighing against their doctrine of the Eucharist, said they swallowed their God. Cannibalism was bad, but they were guilty of theophagism, if he might coin a word. The Rev. S. A. Walker, too, after a violent attack on Dr. Howson's sermon at Liverpool, which was by no means narrow enough for him, said he, for one, would not go to Conferences with such men. They stood in a day when their Church was going into the abyss of Popery, and he could not call these men brethren, but enemies of the cross of Christ; and if he was asked to come to a meeting with them he must expect that in faithfulness to Him who called him the question should be set at rest whether the Church of England was to be a reformed church or whether it was to be an apostate church. How could they say, "We are all brethren," when he recollected the abominations of St. Raphael and All Saints', Clifton? Instead of brethren they were more the children of hell.—Mr. Andrews rejoiced the meeting by stating that, as vice-chairman of the association, he had had the pleasure of signing the first cheque of £500 towards the Archbishop of York's endeavour to put down serious error (in the case, we presume, of Mr. Voysey). And the Rev. W. A. Cornwall elicited loud cheers by urging that a memorial should be prepared and forwarded to the Queen, praying that Dr. Temple should not be appointed to the see of Exeter.

The Pall Mall says:

"Those who have been in the habit of listening with awe and adoration to the solemn utterances of domestic furniture will read with some surprise a letter in the Standard from Mr. W. G. Faulkner, philosophical instrument maker, in which he states that for many years he has had a large sale for spirit-rapping magnets and batteries expressly made for concealment under the floor, in cupboards, under tables, and even for the interior of the centre support of large round tables and boxes. He has supplied also quantities of prepared wire to be placed under the carpets and oilcloth, or under the wainscot and gilt beading around ceilings and rooms. All these, he says, were obviously used for spirit-rapping; and the connection to each rapper and battery was to be made by means of a small button, like those used for telegraphic bell-ringing purposes, or by means of a brass-headed or other nail under the carpet at particular patterns known to the spiritualist. These rappers, he adds, when carefully placed, are calculated to mislead the most wary. Then there are spirit-rapping magnets and batteries constructed expressly for the pocket; and these, he tells us, will of course rap at any part of the room. He has also made drums and bells which will beat and ring at command; but these two latter are not so frequently used as the magnets are, because they are too easily detected."

"Minus," with whom we strongly sympathise, writes to the English Independent:

"I am one of the unfortunate class of individuals who are asked to preach anniversary sermons, give lectures, attend tea-meetings, and the like. Now, what proportion of those who write to me do you think has the thoughtfulness to enclose a stamped envelope? Why, about one-tenth. I reckon that it costs me the price of a holiday per annum in postage about other people's business. I paid my stationer's bill for the quarter last week, and it was over four pounds. Much of this was for paper and envelopes on other people's business."

In his visitation charge at Cambridge, on Tuesday, the Bishop of Ely (Dr. E. H. Browne) told his clergy:

"There was a breadth about the primitive church which they would do well to imitate and desire. In listening to the records of the early church he heard no names like High, or Low, or Broad Church, or even Catholic or Evangelical, as badges of party distinction. With the exception of heretics, they found all were admitted to the same shrines and the same altars as brother Catholic Christians; and most surely, if the modern church was to work for God, to keep united and at peace, it must allow a certain latitude. That which was destined to embrace the world, and to save it, must fail of its errand if it was confined to the narrow limits of a little sect. Let them give God the services of free hearts; for it was more for His glory, and more accordant with His purposes, that good men should honestly think out their own thoughts than that each should be set a fixed copy, from one letter or one title of which he must never swerve. Saint Clement of Alexandria mingled philosophy with his faith in a proportion which we should now think, and with some justice, to be open to question, if not to censure. Origen did not escape censure, but his inquiries were free to the borders of licentiousness; but it was deserving of attention that the deep faith of those days did not fear searching inquiry."

On the union which Dr. Temple's appointment has brought about between Lord Shaftesbury and Dr. Pusey, the Pall Mall observes:

"So strange a combination leaves one in doubt whether to sigh or to smile or to yield to simple astonishment. It is, at least, pleasant to see that those eminent men can be reconciled for a time by a common antipathy, and that these two Christians, at any rate, love one another well enough to combine in bearing testimony against an erring brother. It must be gratifying to them to have at least an excuse for displaying openly those feelings of deep affection which were, doubtless, only concealed for a time by trifling superficial differences. The appointment will not have been quite thrown away if it only brings into open daylight the profound harmony of which we had sometimes lost sight in the heat of passing controversies. Lord Shaftesbury, we know, considered 'Ecce Homo' to have been vomited from the jaws of hell; and he must obviously hold that Puseyism is at worst an emanation from some less objectionable place—we cannot, in deference to his prejudices, suggest purgatory. We would gladly dwell upon this touching spectacle of concord, and forget, if possible, the cause by which it has been brought to light. We would try to think of Dr. Temple's appointment as of the touch of a happier Ithuriel's spear, which has transformed each leader in the eyes of his opponent from the likeness of a serpent to that (comparatively speaking) of an angel of light. And yet it is rather hard upon Dr. Temple. What, we cannot help asking, are his claims to the character of a heresiarch? How is it that his elevation has caused so profound a scandal as to throw those two amiable enthusiasts into each other's arms like a couple of long-lost brothers? The answer, of course, is obvious, that Dr. Temple was an Essayist-and-Reviewer—if that compound substantive is permissible. We know also that it is a general principle in theological controversy to attribute to a writer not only any inferences which you may draw from his opinions, but also any opinions which are held by anybody in any way connected with him."

CANADA LETTER.

TORONTO, PROVINCE OF ONTARIO,
7TH OCTOBER, 1869.

In the Unitarian Herald of 17th ult., I find my letter to you dated 25th August. I thank you for the interest you take in the cause of liberal Christianity in Canada, and especially for your friendly action in reference to the Church at Toronto. Although it was not intended for publication, I do not object to its being subjected to that ordeal if any good can be done thereby.

You can have no idea on your side of the Atlantic how much liberal Christians have decreased in Canada from want of religious ordinances. For example, the rural districts of the county of York, in which the city of Toronto is situated, had, according to the census returns for 1851, 198 Unitarians. The census of 1861 gives the number at ten—amounting nearly to extinction. The county of Shefford, in the province of Quebec (formerly Lower Canada), in the census of 1851, gave 239 Unitarians; in the returns of 1861, none! The results presented by whole provinces are not less discouraging. In Ontario, during the decade 1851-61, the decrease has been forty per cent. In the province of Quebec, the decrease, in the same decade, is seventy-nine per cent. What may be the result of the census of 1871 I dare hardly surmise, but I expect to hear of a still greater diminution. The only places where the numbers of Unitarians have not decreased, are the cities of Montreal and Toronto, where churches have been built, and religious ministrations sustained. Here, then, the painful fact becomes patent, that when Unitarians emigrate from Great Britain, or the United States, into Canada, and settle anywhere outside the cities of Montreal or Toronto, they become lost to our household of faith. Within my personal knowledge, during a residence of over fifty years in this country, I have had occasion to notice many cases of such religious "deaths from destitution." Some of the aged never identify themselves with the surrounding denominations, attend their worship but seldom, as they find but little spiritual nurture, and go down to the grave without religious ordinances; but with the young the case is different; they become absorbed into the surrounding churches, and hence the decrease which I have noted.

Some years ago, the Toronto Church, being desirous to turn all its financial resources toward the extinction of a church debt, sustained lay services. On one occasion, when I was officiating, I observed one person, a stranger, who seemed to listen to the sermon (read) with intense interest. After the service, he came up to me, shook hands, and said, "Oh, sir, with what pleasure did I listen to your sermon; it is the first Unitarian discourse I have heard from the pulpit in sixteen years." He was an English Unitarian, and resided in a district remote from Toronto. How many hundreds of such cases have the Canadas furnished within the last half century?

When I see commercial travellers representing English firms, composed in whole, or in part, of Unitarians, traversing our country, and "pushing sales" of their goods, I cannot put from me the thought, that were those rich brethren in England as anxious to send us the "pearl of great price" as they are to sell us their hardware, woollen, cotton, and fancy goods, how different would be the position of Unitarianism in Canada. To-day its numbers may be said to have dwindled down to a merely nominal figure (except in Montreal and Toronto), and probably not more than two or three places could now be found where congregations of from twenty-five to fifty could be gathered together. There is "no vision" (no help of missionaries from our brethren in the motherland), and our "people perish."

[Our parcel for our friends at Toronto will be made up at the end of this month. We shall be glad therefore by the time of our next issue for any further contributions.]

THE SEE OF EXETER.

The opposition to Dr. Temple's appointment as successor of Bishop Phillpotts is just of a kind that would have delighted him, and into which he would have thrown himself with all his strength. The battle threatens to rage loud, if not long, and the stormy winds are sure to blow. High and Low, Shaftesbury and Pusey, Record and Church Times, laying aside their hostility for the nonce, have combined their forces, and are beseeching the Exeter Dean and Chapter to disobey the Queen's mandate, and refuse to elect the heretical bishop whom she has decided to set over them. At a meeting in Leeds, Archdeacon Denison, who doesn't always mind what he says, stated that the said dignitaries were prepared to resist the appointment "as one man;" but Archdeacon Freeman, who is one of their number, writes to say that this is a mistake; and it appears that Canon Cook, by far the ablest member of the chapter, is warmly supporting Dr. Temple, and that some of the prebendaries cordially approve his nomination, while only three or four members of the chapter, it is believed, are ready to go the length of refusing to elect him. The opposition among the clergy of the diocese, too, is evidently subsiding, many of them, who probably had not done so before, having read his "notorious Essay," and not been able to detect any dreadful heresy in it. Canon Girdlestone has not only declined to sign the memorial against the appointment, but says, for the clergy to recommend to those in a responsible position a breach of that law which they are all, by their sacred calling, especially bound both by precept and example to maintain, is in his opinion a course fraught with peril to the Church, and even to the truth. And Dr. Benson, head master of Wellington College, and examining chaplain to Bishop Wordsworth, which is a sufficient guarantee of his orthodoxy, boldly tells those who are raising this hue and cry against Dr. Temple that "they know not the courage, the manliness, the life, which they would divert from the service of the Church; they know not the power of inspiration, not short of genius, which he has for others;" and "least of all do they know his sympathetic charity, and the might of his Christian faith."

No one ventures to insinuate a doubt that he is a man of high, pure character, thoroughly conscientious and honest, and one who will most faithfully and conscientiously discharge all the duties of a bishop, according to his understanding of them. And as for the Essay which is made the ground of objection, it is hard to see how any who are in favour of the connection between Church and State can rest on that, remembering that the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council not only sent away from their chamber the much more heretical Dr. Rowland Williams and the Rev. H. B. Wilson vindicated, but adjudged their episcopal prosecutor to pay the costs. In fact, the question which Dr. Pusey and Lord Shaftesbury are raising is whether the Broad party in the Church is to be smothered, and High and Low left alone to bark and fight. As we said last week, considering what occurred when Dr. Hampden was nominated to the see of Hereford, we have no idea that the Exeter Dean and Chapter will defy the Crown in this case; but if they should, according to a clause of the well-known Act of Henry VIII., which still holds good, royal letters patent may be substituted for the usual congé d'élire, and the vacant see filled up in the same way that appointments are made to the Indian bishoprics.

Some imagine that, if only noise and clamour enough be made, Dr. Temple may be driven into saying in real earnest nolo episcopari. But if we know anything of him, he is not the man to play so cowardly a part, and give such a triumph to High Church intolerance and Low Church bigotry, but one who will stand by his colours, and accept the post to which he has been called, and by the way in which he fills it soon leave no doubt of his fitness for it.

BIRMINGHAM: HURST-STREET MISSION. — The annual congregational tea meeting took place on Monday evening last, the 25th anniversary of the opening of the chapel. Nearly 250 sat down to tea in the large room, after which the meeting adjourned into the chapel, which contained a magnificent show of flowers. The Mayor of Birmingham, Henry Holland, Esq., presided, and the Revs. H. W. Crosskey, B. Wright, Messrs. W. Earl, J. R. Mott, F. Grew, R. Taylor, J. F. Luckett, &c., addressed the meeting. Several anthems and choruses were well sung during the evening by the Hurst-street choir. The opening of the chapel a quarter of a century ago was thus celebrated by a very pleasant and successful meeting.

DR. TEMPLE AND THE BIGOTS.

BIGOTS we must call such men as Dr. PUSEY, Archdeacon DENISON, and Lord SHAFTESBURY, because, first, they speak and act as if they knew themselves to be infallible, and all who differed from them therefore convicted of deadly error; and because, secondly, they speak and act as if dogmas—their dogmas—were the most essential things in this world, as if the Church existed but to teach them—and as if to teach them were the only means of saving men from perdition. And yet we cannot help pitying them, and almost, in one sense, sympathising with them in the anguish and indignation of soul they are feeling at the announcement of the appointment of Dr. TEMPLE—one of the heretical writers in the most heretical Essays and Reviews—to the See of Exeter. For though we dislike the spirit of the men, yet we cannot help feeling that the State—that is, the nation at large acting through its Government—has, by its theological belief-moulders, the Thirty-nine Articles and the Prayer Book, contributed most largely to make them what they are. The State, i.e., the nation, has now for three hundred years been jealously guarding a machinery the very action of which has been to compress the mind and prevent it from expanding, as truly as the Chinese shoe is a machine for compressing the foot and preventing its natural growth. Minds like those of PUSEY, DENISON, and SHAFTESBURY are the natural results and the unfortunate victims of the compression: and when a mind like TEMPLE's appears among them, and who has somehow continued to burst or dodge the machine while subjected to it, he appears to them a kind of monster. He is a fox who has not consented to the sacred mutilation of cutting off his tail; he is pitied and shrunk from by them as the visitor to the Alpine village was pitied and shrunk from by the villagers whose necks were deformed by the goitre, while he was without what seemed to them the hallowed excrescence. These men are in their theological narrowness a standing reproach to the nation which has been the means of moulding them to be as they are.

How stands the case? The State has now for more than three centuries undertaken to teach the nation a certain kind of knowledge, or supposed knowledge, called theology or religion. A text book or summary of the knowledge it proposed to teach was drawn up in the sixteenth century—the Articles and Book of Common Prayer. Since that time all who wished to be ministers of the State-Church have had to subscribe to this summary or text book. Their teaching must conform itself to it, or the State, through its tribunals, will suspend the offender or deprive him altogether. Thus what we call the State-Church is, in fact, in one sense, a great State school or body of schools, where the clergy are the schoolmasters or lecturers.

Men confuse themselves by talking about an abstraction called the Church, which has in the general mind no very definite meaning. If, for the national establishment, we think of a school—theological school—we shall be much nearer the fact, and shall understand what we are speaking about. We do not mean that the work of teaching comprehends the whole work of the clergy; they are the organs also of the people's worship: but the State seems to have laid enormous stress on their teaching: for it is in regard to their teaching that it has laid down the greatest number of principles. And here lies the national folly and sin,—that whilst its own views have been gradually changing—whilst new lights have come upon it on every side, from science, from philosophy, from criticism, from development of the national heart and conscience, so that the thirty-nine articles and the creeds have no longer represented the national faith, so that multitudes receive their propositions only with great modifications—multitudes doubt the truth of most of them—and multitudes again of the most thoughtful and educated disbelieve and deny them altogether, and believe the very opposite to their assertions,—whilst all this has been going on the nation has still practically kept the old formularies drawn up in the sixteenth century, as if these were still the faithful representatives of the national faith. It has required its teachers to subscribe to these formularies, and to go on teaching them as if it believed them. What is this but one huge and terrible lie? And now the lie is bearing fruits in the ecclesiastical complications of the times. There are men like PUSEY and DENISON who have taken the State at its word. They have supposed that the articles and creeds of the State-Church did to a great extent represent the general national faith. They have probably grown up in homes and amid characters already moulded, compressed, and narrowed by them. They have studied in colleges where their shadow at least was always present. When they began to consecrate themselves to the work of religious teaching they felt the necessity of keeping close to the articles and creeds, or of abandoning the work for ever. They rejected all natural doubt—threw it out of their minds like a loaded bombshell. They shut out all light that would have revealed the doctrines they believed as error. And thus they became what we see them to-day. When we see men like those of whom we have just spoken, men of great powers and many noble qualities, and who might have been strong helpers of the age in attaining its noblest aims, and then see what they are—hinderers of education, hinderers of free thought, hinderers of every best and most generous movement, we cannot but feel sad and indignant that the nation should thus keep up a gigantic trap, as it were, for catching and spoiling some of its best minds, especially those whom it sets up as teachers of the people.

Can we wonder that DENISON should proclaim, "that if the appointment of Dr. TEMPLE to the see of Exeter, or any other see of the Church of England, shall be carried out, it will become the duty of every churchman to labour actively and steadily to dissolve all connection between the Church and the State." The truth is, it must seem to the men moulded and formed as we have described, that the State has broken faith with them. They may naturally say, "We have accepted the articles bona fide, for what we know they are, the summary of the science of theology, as it was known and believed in the sixteenth century. We have let them mould our minds, and give the impression to all our thoughts, and then you—the State—first by your tribunals, and next by the patronage of men who deny all that we believe, seem to say, "The more fools you for your pains. We never supposed you would take us—the nation—literally at our word. You may believe as much as you please, but you are not required to believe or teach more than the letter of the articles, as construed by the lawyer, obliges you; and whatever by any subtlety or twisting you can bring within the legal scope of any of the articles you may believe and teach. You may believe in baptismal regeneration and inspiration of the Scriptures and eternal torment if you please, but you are not obliged to believe any of them." "We cannot accept your new liberal gloss," they may say. "We have grown up on the sixteenth century theology, which you imposed upon us, and we cannot change. We cannot and will not accept as fellow-workers, still less as our spiritual heads, those who deny all that we affirm, and would pull down all that we build up."

What is the reply to this indignant declaration? Grant their demand. Cease to support this huge lie of a national faith embodied in the Thirty-nine Articles. Cut the Church free from the State, and let it follow and correspond to the real religious mind of the nation in its various divisions. One other thing might indeed be possible—the simple removal of all dogmatic bonds, leaving a national Church perfectly free and comprehensive. But that is an idea impracticable as yet in a world as dogmatic as ours.

BUNHILL FIELDS.

THIS burying-ground, the casket that holds the jewels of English Nonconformity, was publicly opened last week after its rescue from the tender mercies of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. At this moment a notice of its literature may be interesting.

The Harleian MS., No. 6212, contains a neatly written collection of the epitaphs in Bunhill Fields; it seems to contain none later than 1738. There is one on Captain John Smith, "Treasurer of St. Thomas' Hospital many years, whose study was to imitate his Redeemer here by doing good, and departed on the 7th day of March, 1698, at Clapham, with a joyfull hope to meet him in glory hereafter."

Another (A.D. 1725) is described as being "On a handsome square pedestal with an obelisk about eighteen feet high (and iron railings); and runs, 'Here lyes Joseph Collet, Esq., late of Hartford Castle, some time President and Governor of Fort St. George in the East Indies, who lived and dyed in the firm belief of a resurrection to an happy immortality, the gift of the One only Supreme God the Father by the ministration of His Son Jesus Christ.' This monument is still in good preservation; but does any abler record survive of the heretical statesman?"

An epitaph (1720) on a Mrs. Bowles, gives—after a quotation from Watts—"the language of her precious soul at the near approach of death in the words of the same author:

"Thy love (a sea without a shore)
Spreads life and joy abroad;
O! 'tis a heaven worth dying for,
To see a smiling God."

An epitaph (1733) is given from a stone erected to a Dissenting minister, the Rev. D. Wilcox, by his congregation, which tells us that he was "called suddenly out of this life," and adds—"Sudden death, sudden glory. A common saying of the deceased."

An epitaph still extant there on Elizabeth Elworthy, who died 1810, aged ten years and five weeks, mentions, "Her dying words 'with Jesus on the road.'"

Surviving friends are sad copyists; grief and funeral expenses annihilate originality. The popular "He who is born to-day, and dies to-morrow, loses some days of rest, but months of sorrow," is at least 200 years old. (See Ayscough's MSS. 719.) Our old friend, "Afflictions sore, long time he bore," which flourishes with such perennial vigour in the churchyards of to-day, appears in Bunhill Fields as long ago as 1735; and "Farewell, vain world," almost as common a one, was there in 1737.

When I visited Bunhill Fields in October, 1868, I found close to the entrance the tomb of Dr. Price; a little north of this, and plainly legible from the road, is the lengthy epitaph of the Radical Hardy. On the south side of the walk is the tomb of Bunyan, and very near it that of a certain Susannah, thereon recorded as "the mother of nineteen children, of whom the most eminent were the Rev. John and Charles Wesley, the former of whom was under God the founder of the societies of the people called Methodists." On the other side of the ground is an altar tomb, one side of which relates of a Theophilus Lindsey, that "having resigned his preferment in the Church for the sake of truth and a good conscience, he became the founder of the chapel in Essex-street"—aye, and of a goodly fellowship of truthseekers whom no single temple can contain. At one end of his tomb is—if I remember rightly—his wife's epitaph; at the other end that of Mrs. Elizabeth Rayner, who though "nearly allied in blood to the illustrious house of Percy, esteemed it a still greater honour to be the friend and fellow-worshipper of Mr. and Mrs. Lindsey, and by her own desire was deposited in the same grave." Her age is given as eighty-four, but the date of death does not appear. On the fourth side of the tomb is an inscription which I found undecipherable, but above it I could, with difficulty, read "Ossibus ossa meis, et nomen nomen tangam."

I was struck by the number of persons who are recorded on the gravestones by initials only. One stone commemorated eight members of a family in as many brief lines, beginning simply "T. S. 1795," and after six similar entries, closing with another "T. S. 1857." One unlike tomb, near Governor Collet's, bears no trace of any mark or inscription. Some, on the other hand, are sonorous and irrepressible; as "Silent beneath this grassy turf sleep the mortal remains of Robert Young, D.D.; and an urgent poet, determined to press his point:

"The fight is o'er, the conflict's done,
The sword is sheathed, the victory's won;
Jesus, my captain, brought me through,
In every danger he proved true.
Shouldst thou, O reader, doubt the dead,
Consult St. Paul what he hath said,"

(Rom. viii., 38, 39.)

There is a ringing vigour in this one (1792):

"Faith doth triumph o'er the grave,
And tramples on the tombs;
My Jesus, my Redeemer, lives,
My God, my Saviour, comes."

On an old man who died in 1800 is this:

"Ripened for heavenly grace divine,
Like autumn fruit he fell.
Reader, think not to live so long,
But strive to live as well."

Another in 1819 says:

'Tis the survivor dies.—
'Friends part—

AMERICAN NOTES.

The New York Methodist, in an article entitled "Are they Camp-meetings or Pic-nics?" says:

"Our great camp-meetings seem more and more every year to assume the character of great pic-nics; so that it is hard to tell whether the leading feature of the meeting is social or religious. In some instances one inducement offered to proposed purchasers of camp-meeting 'lots' is the fact that the location of the camp grounds is an eligible one for a temporary residence during a few weeks of the summer. Pure, bracing air, good fishing, delightful drives, beautiful scenery, fine bathing, are some of the attractions set down in the bill of fare. Instead of tents, are houses, neatly finished, and comfortably, not to say elegantly, furnished and built to remain on the ground year after year. Here the families of the owners reside for weeks at a time, enjoying themselves in a quiet, rural way, and finding, we dare say, a better return for their money than they could get at a crowded watering-place, with its fashion and its folly. Happy will they be if they can always keep fashion and folly away from their temporary summer homes. Another manifestly pic-nic feature of modern camp-meetings is what is called the 'refreshment stand.' Nobody will pretend to say that the articles usually sold here are essential to a religious meeting. What has piety to do with pea-nuts? or soda-water? or with ice-cream? or with tobacco? or with the score of other wares exhibited for sale at such times? These may be more or less appropriate to pic-nics, according to the tastes of the visitors, but surely no one will pretend that they of right belong to a religious meeting. Remember, too, that these articles are freely sold during public service, so that the preaching of the gospel, the songs of praise, even the prayers of God's people, are mingled with the popping of corks, the cracking of shells, the giddy gossip of ice-cream eaters, and the jingling of pence. These facts, with others, plainly indicate that the pic-nic part of the 'camp-meeting' is fast over-riding the spiritual and religious features."

A correspondent of the New York Tribune gives some account of Mr. Laurence Oliphant's society at Brocton, on the banks of Lake Erie, of which we printed a short notice some time ago. He says that Mr. Oliphant objects to have his association called "a community." "We have no communism," he said, "among us. We are simply a band of persons who, thinking alike on most subjects, having a strong democratic tendency, holding enthusiastically the same religious views, and being equally desirous of doing God's will, and making our daily lives one continuous act of obedience to his command—in fact, making every day a Sunday—have associated ourselves together and live together, hoping that, while by the concentration of our energies and by mutual religious sustenance we may benefit ourselves both here and hereafter, we may at the same time set a lively example to others, and, if we cannot draw them to ourselves, lead them to do as we do in other places." The association does not choose to divulge the terms upon which its property is held, and thinks that if the public has any right to ask questions it has an equal right to withhold any answers. All, therefore, that is to be seen at Brocton is a society of fifty or sixty persons engaged in various farming pursuits, and apparently living very harmoniously together. They are of all nations, including two Japanese. They hold, the Tribune's correspondent informs us, "a sort of poetical development of Swedenborgianism." Their conception of Sunday does not involve going to church, as they have no place of public worship, and prefer "internal religion" to external. They have, however, a prophet in the Rev. Mr. Harris, an Englishman by birth, who had previously been a universalist, a rationalist, and a spiritualist (in which capacity some of our readers may remember him lecturing in this country), and had also "a longing to be the head and front of some movement." With this purpose he joined a community at a place called Amenia in 1864, which appears to have subsequently collapsed, and with some of its members has started the present society. The management is eminently practical. "Each one has his or her special duties, and cheerfully performs them." The estate is divided into seventeen farms, containing altogether 1,600 acres, described as flat and uninteresting, with the exception of a small and more picturesque portion on the shore of the lake, near Mr. Oliphant's own house. "About eighty acres is planted with several varieties of grapes, a small quantity supplies the association with vegetables, and there are a few patches of corn and oats; the rest of the estate where cleared is grass land." But it is added, "farming and wine-making are still in their infancy."

Miss Anna Dickinson, from one of whose lectures we gave some extracts a little time ago, resolved to see for herself what Mormonism really is, has visited the Salt Lake City. Among her experiences she describes at length a visit which she paid to the house of a Mormon elder, who was very rich, and lived in great style, and had only two wives. She had been told that it was a very happy family, but as she was not a man, "she did not believe a word of it," and went to see for herself. The wife she first saw was "a fine, good-looking, healthy Englishwoman, who could not speak ten words of grammatical English to save her life." And here is the way in which Miss Dickinson got the truth out of her:

"I asked her how long she had been married. 'Seventeen years.' 'Married here?' 'No.' 'Married in England?' 'No.' 'Where were you married, then?' 'In St. Joseph.' Her husband began to fidget, and sent her out to get a piece of gold, or quartz, or something of that kind. I understood it all. She came back, and couldn't find it, of course. I knew that. I tried to commence where we had broken off, and her husband immediately wanted something on the top of the house. When she got back again I tried to commence again where we had left off, and he broke in, 'Miss Dickinson came to eat strawberries and cream; now, Maria, go off and see they are ready.' I understood it all. Yes, every word of it. By-and-by in came another sad-looking but handsome woman. I looked at her; said I at once, 'Madam, you are the second wife,' and so it turned out. She, also, was an Englishwoman, and the two of them were the handsomest women I saw at Salt Lake. But she appeared sad and worn. There was no 'joyous happiness of married life' about her. There was a piano in the room, and in came the little girl of the house, and at once the father said something about music, and was evidently very proud of his daughter's capabilities in that line, so I asked her to play, and she did, and made a horrid din, and, under cover of the noise and din, I had my conversation with the wife. She had not understood their doctrines. I asked her, 'Did you know, when you married your husband, that he could, if he would, marry another woman?' 'No.' 'Did he not tell you so at the time?' 'No, he did not. Our missionaries and preachers when they go out never preach that.' 'So you knew nothing of it?' 'Nothing at all.' 'But when you came here and saw it was so, were you not greatly disappointed and chagrined?' 'No, I was not. I was sure my husband would never marry again.' 'But he did,' said I. 'Yes,' she answered, and a sad, harrowed look came over her countenance. 'Yes, only a year after he married again.' 'And do you like that? Do you like him to have more wives than one?' 'Oh, yes, I do; I wish he had six or seven.' I saw through it all in a minute. I understood the state of that woman's mind at once. But I was not surprised. I looked blank, and I went back on the old tack. I commenced and questioned her about her English life, and I painted the picture of the little cottage at home and the courtship, and at last the marriage to one whole-souled, honest husband, and how they would live together, and how she would wait at the door of their home and watch for his coming in the evening; and asked her if she could not be happy there. And she put her handsome hand to her face and bowed her head and cried, 'Oh, my God, couldn't I!' And then it was plain, it was easy to see how that woman really thought and felt."

GOLDEN HAIR.

GOLDEN HAIR sat on her grandfather's knee;
Dear little Golden Hair, tired was she,
All the day busy as busy could be.

Up in the morning as soon as 'twas light;
Out with the birds and the butterflies bright;
Flitting about till the coming of night.

Grandfather toyed with the curls on her head:
"What has my baby been doing," he said,
"Since she arose with the sun from her bed?"

"Pitty much," answered the sweet little one;
"I cannot tell so much things have I done,— Played with my dolly, and feeded my 'bun';"

"And I have jumped with my little jump-rope;
And then I made out of water and soap
Buftle worlds, mamma's 'castles of hope.'"

"Then I have readed in my picture-book;
And little Bella and I went to look
For some smooth stones by the side of the brook.

"Then I come home, and I eated my tea,
And I climbed up to my grandpa's knee,—
I'm jes as tired as tired can be."

Nearer and nearer the little head pressed,
Until it drooped upon grandfather's breast.
Dear little Golden Hair, "sweet be thy rest!"

We are but children: the things that we do
Are as sports of a babe to the Infinite view
That sees all our weakness, and pities it too.

God grant that when night overshadows our way,
And we shall be called to account for the day,
He may find it as guileless as Golden Hair's play.

And, oh! when a-weary, may we be so blest
As to sink like an innocent child to our rest,
And feel ourselves clasped to the Infinite breast!

TOTAL ECLIPSE OF THE SUN.

WE mentioned a fortnight ago that the Rev. J. F. Clark, who went West to see this sight, was so impressed by it that he said he would willingly have gone another 1,200 miles to see it again during another two minutes. We have since met with a graphic description of it by the Rev. T. L. Cuyler, which we here give somewhat abridged. Others, he says, will tell the story scientifically; let me jot down a few impressions of a scene that affected me as it did the children that stood beside me. Augusta—a village of Illinois—was almost under the centre of the total obscuration. "You could not have a better place to see it," said the astronomer of Princeton College to me a week ago. "And not to see the eclipse in its totality is about equal to being half-married or half-converted."

At four o'clock we stood in the door-yard with smoked glass in hand; and, as one of us was watching the blazing sun, he exclaimed, "There she comes!" When a boy, I had read of this very eclipse, and of the moment it should begin. It did begin at the precise second predicted forty years ago! The shadow came over the sun exceeding gradually. The landscape around us began to look yellowish and ghastly. The grass seemed to be getting sick. Over the trees played a weird, lurid light, and every leaf hung perfectly motionless. "Oh! see how queer those flowers look! And those currant-bushes! It looks as if Nature was getting the jaundice!" An odd thought; and yet I do not know of any other idea that would more truly describe Nature's ghastly hue.

"See who'll catch the first star," said one of our group. The shadow deepened. The devouring moon pushed on, until the helpless sun was nearly smothered. "There—look! look! See—see—it is almost gone!" Only a minute more and it is total! "Yonder is a star!" exclaimed one of our company. It was Regulus, blazing away close by the bed of the dying sun. (But Venus had been shining for full five minutes, without our discovering her golden locks.) "Only a few seconds more!" But, ah! what a transformation do those few seconds work! Even as in a human history the deed of a moment suffices to darken a destiny for life.

"Total!" we all exclaimed together. In an instant, in the twinkling of an eye came down an awful shadow, as of a black wing, filling the whole heavens. It was ineffably frightful. Coleridge's lines flashed into my mind in a moment—

"The sun's rim dips; the stars rush out!
With one stride comes the dark!"

To the north the horizon was dyed with a rich orange hue. But above us and around us the air seemed to be filled with fine black particles. It was so dark that I could not recognise a countenance a hundred yards off; and yet it was not the darkness of an ordinary evening. It was the darkness of death! Above a group of trees before us a flock of birds flew wildly to and fro, as if panic-stricken. A couple of cows went lowing past the gate—the only sound in the awful stillness. Just over the fence a half-dozen chickens had composed themselves to roost in a cherry-tree. A dozen stars were twinkling in various parts of the heavens. The air was chill as midnight.

The best description I can give of the sun when in total obscuration is that it looked as if a circular shield of sheet-iron had been riveted over it; and just at the lower edge glittered a bright, rosy clasp or nut, as if it was the head of the screw which attached the black shield to the sun. All around that shield flashed out the white rays of the corona. This corona had a shimmering, silvery brightness, and was fearfully and wonderfully beautiful. Its edges were not smooth, but scalloped, and from every point small beads of light seemed to float off into the sky.

The mighty pall of darkness hung over us for almost three minutes. During that time every one in our group had a deathlike hue. So might have looked the face of the universe to the Apostle John in some of his apocalyptic visions. At two minutes after five, as we stood gazing at the black orb, with its magnificent corona, a sudden flash of golden light burst forth from the northern limb. It was the most thrilling instant I ever knew, and the most splendid spectacle I ever witnessed. As if God said "Let there be light!" a sheaf of dazzling rays burst forth in a twinkling and came flying towards us through the air. The whole sky lightened instantaneously. Methought that the "sons of God" must have seen something like this when on Creation's morn the first flood of radiance broke on black chaos at the Almighty voice. He spake, and it was done!

A GRATEFUL PIKE.

In a work by Ernest Menault, a French writer, on the "Intelligence of Animals," the object of which is to show that, to the extent of their faculties, they are all rational creatures, he gives this well-attested story of a pike, which was told by Dr. Warwick, for a time one of our ministers, before the Literary and Philosophical Society of Liverpool, in 1850. The Doctor was one evening walking in Dunham Park, belonging to the Earl of Stamford, by the bank of a lake which abounded with fish. A fine jack, of about six pounds weight, on seeing the Doctor, started from the edge into the middle of the water, in doing which it fractured its skull against a post. In its agony it flung itself clean out of the water on to the bank. On examining the fish he found that a small part of the brain had gone out through the fracture of the cranium. This he carefully replaced with a silver toothpick, raising at the same time, the depressed part of the skull. During the operation the fish was perfectly quiet, and on being replaced in the water seemed at first to be relieved. After a few minutes, however, it began to plunge about as if in pain, and again flung itself upon the bank. Doctor Warwick then called the keeper, with whose assistance he applied a bandage to the fracture. The pike was then flung into the water and left to its fate. But next morning, as the Doctor sat upon the bank of the lake, the pike came quite near to him, and put its head near its physician's feet. Such an extraordinary act rather astonished the Doctor, who took the fish in his hand and discovered that its head was going on well. Then, as the Doctor walked along the bank, his grateful patient swam after him, turning when he turned. Next day he took some young friends to see the wonder, when the pike immediately appeared and swam towards him as before. At length this fish became so tame that it came when the Doctor whistled, and ate from his hand. With other people, however, it was gloomy and fierce as it always had been. Mere instinct, so-called, entirely fails, M. Menault thinks, to account for the singular conduct of this Dunham jack.

TOO BAD OF THE DOCTOR.

THE Greenock Telegraph says, that on the afternoon of last Sunday but one, the eloquent minister of the West Parish, in his closing prayer, referred to the long prevailing drought, and earnestly besought the Divine Giver of all good to vouchsafe some seasonable and much-wished-for rain. Immediately rain began to fall—the first for many weeks—and for a short time it fell like a shower-bath. Meanwhile, the church service having concluded, the congregation was dismissed, and then came the scramble for umbrellas. One lady who had no umbrella with her commenced to gather the skirts of her gown over her head before quitting the church vestibule, at the same time remarking to a neighbour, "Eh, wumman, isn't it too bad o' the doctor; he might hae gotten us hame first."

ANTHROPOPHAGY.

PROFESSOR HUXLEY has expressed an opinion that in the earliest ages of the world the first impulse of man was not to love his neighbour, but to eat him; and at a recent meeting of the Archaeological Society of Copenhagen the savants assembled from all parts of Europe, including such well-known names as Worsaae, Hildebrand, and the celebrated Belgian professor, M. Sprieg, unanimously agreed that cannibalism prevailed among the primitive inhabitants of the globe. On one point, however, opinions are divided, some holding that man-eating was a matter of taste, while others are inclined to look on it as a religious, or rather superstitious, observance. As late as the year 785 Charlemagne issued a decree sentencing to death any individual convicted of having eaten a witch in order to destroy her spells. Witch-eating can hardly have been a matter of taste, as even "those who were fond of the flesh could not have been partial to bones." Buckle quotes comparatively recent instances of anthropophagy connected with religious feelings, in Germany during the Thirty Years' War, and in Scotland at about the same period. Among the most curious documents produced at the meeting was a manuscript of St. Hieronymus, who asserts, on the authority of a native of Great Britain, that children were a staple article of food in that country.

NEWCASTLE.

UNITARIAN CONFERENCE AND SOIREE.

A CONFERENCE of ministers and laymen connected with the Unitarian and Free Christian Churches of Northumberland and Durham was held on Monday last in the Church of the Divine Unity, under the presidency of the Rev. J. C. Street. Among the ministers and delegates present were the Revs. E. W. Hopkinson, Barnardcastle; W. Elliott, Stockton; T. Leyland, Choppington; J. Whitworth, Sunderland; W. Brunton, Middlesborough; Messrs. Joseph Clephan, G. Lucas, James Watson, Scott, Pilkington, J. Dickson, Hobkirk, Arthur, Pescott, Miller, J. Miller, J. Robinson, Newcastle; R. Elliott, Holmes, Scott, Thomas Bowman, Doughty, Stevenson, Harrison, John Morpeth, Choppington; Graham, Darlington; G. Lee, Barnardcastle; T. Brown, Crook; J. Metcalf, Sunderland; and Dr. Lunge, North Shields.

The CHAIRMAN, in opening the proceedings, remarked that Liberal Christianity had had a great battle with superstition and indifference in the northern counties of the empire. Of late years, it had done more than hold its own, however, and new centres had been formed wherein the proclamation of their truths took place. In consequence of the activity of the past few years, those who had been engaged in the work had been brought face to face with more difficulties than had been thought to exist. Every new attempt had brought new opponents and new trials. They had had to struggle with the organised forms of credal Christianity, the followers of which, the moment they saw that the Unitarian Church was resolutely bent on securing places wherein a broader and more Liberal Christianity should be preached, made efforts to preserve the ground to themselves. In no instance had the Liberal Church been defeated. They had had to face much obloquy, a good deal of persecution, and a great amount of controversy, but they had passed on with a degree of success, for which they were sincerely thankful to the Almighty. New centres of religious life had been formed, and, it seemed, therefore, to the mission committee in Newcastle, that it would be very desirable at stated times to gather together the representatives of these Liberal Christian congregations throughout the two or three counties in the north, in order to confer as to the progress, method of work, development of principles, and schemes which could be adopted for carrying their truths further than they had hitherto gone.

THEOLOGICAL PROGRESS.

The Rev. J. WHITWORTH, Sunderland, read a paper on "Theological progress and the relation of Liberal churches thereto." After noticing the progress made at home, and in France, and in America, giving it as his opinion that theology must be progressive to advancing civilisation, progressive in the removal of obstructions, and progressive in the hearing and the teaching of new truth, he asked—What had Liberal churches to do at the present day? Had they to stand quietly by and see themselves deprived of their heritage? Their position was not that. They had to protest as loudly as ever against dogmatism of creed, and against Liberalism still disguising itself as orthodoxy. The Liberal Christian churches had a noble work to do, and if faithful to their trust they would aid in bringing about the day when "the kingdom of this world shall have become the kingdom of our God and of His Christ." (Applause.)—Mr. Jos. CLEPHAN also read a paper on the same subject. He said Calvinistic views prevailed to a large extent within his recollection, and his hearers probably remembered the howl with which Colenso's first book was received from one end of the land to the other. Colenso's writings had done good work. Since then freer and more enlightened opinions are entertained, and the Unitarian body had been instrumental in much of that. Were they as a Church to be satisfied to act in the capacity of a heaven, or should they deem it a duty to assume a more active character, and to aim at extension and enlargement as a denomination? He had no doubt upon the subject. If they possessed the truth let them teach it. They should assume a more active character, and set about enlarging and extending their Church as a denomination. As they valued their religious faith, so should they be anxious that others should share its benefits. The missionary work, he thought, was a step in the right direction, and he called upon their Choppington friends to say whether he was right or not.

Mr. G. LUCAS, Gateshead, referred to Dean Alford's book on "How to study the New Testament," as showing a similarity of opinion to the views enunciated by the previous speaker.

Mr. JAMES WATSON told the Conference how and by what means he became a Unitarian; and asserted that, believing in the doctrines of that Church, he found great comfort and peace of mind.

Rev. W. BRUNTON, Middlesborough, said it was conceded that the world at the present time was at its brightest phase of theological progress. The work of progress had been difficult, but despite difficulties, their Church was abreast of the age, and not behind it. It was the duty of the Unitarian Church to be very Liberal. Let them enforce the old truths and receive the new, and like Christ they would then be the disseminators of a pure and holy religion.

CHRISTIANITY AMONGST WORKMEN.

The Rev. T. LEYLAND next read a paper on "Methods of work in spreading liberal Christianity among the working men of the district." He remarked that in imparting a true knowledge of the Gospel of Jesus Christ, the truth which was freed from creed, canon, and dogma, it was necessary at the outset to have a good and efficient organisation. All who held liberal Christian views should associate more together, from stronger and wider ties, and help each other with money and personal sympathy; while they should also endeavour to extend their principles by means of the spoken and the written word. Firstly, they should endeavour to do this from the pulpit by setting forth the truth; secondly, they should use the platform for comparison between their own and other religions, and allow free and full discussion to all; thirdly, they should extend their visits and influence to the homes of the people, than which, if conducted with a becoming and loving spirit, no plan could be more beneficial; and fourthly, they should endeavour to attract the people by expounding their views in the open streets and lanes. Then as to the written word, they should contrive to circulate as much as possible the works of Channing, Theodore Parker, and Collyer; they should publish tracts and pamphlets containing epitomes of such works; they should disseminate small leaflets on which should be embodied the main facts of their faith; and they should also circulate a periodical devoted to their own interests, and in which should be embodied reports as to the way in which the work was going on. If these suggestions were acted upon, he thought a better day would speedily dawn upon their efforts.

Mr. JAMES WATSON and Mr. PILKINGTON strongly advocated the home visiting system as being likely to bring about the best results.

The CHAIRMAN instanced the good results which had arisen from a discussion on Unitarianism at Blyth, and recommended the adoption of that course whenever it could be applied.

The Rev. WM. ELLIOTT, of Stockton, thought much good could be effected by posting outside the chapel doors a clear exposition of their principles.

Mr. BROWN, of Crook, Mr. PILKINGTON, and the Rev. Mr. BRUNTON also alluded to the different aspects of the debate; the latter gentleman adding that a good means for accomplishing the object in view would be by a freer allusion to the Unitarian doctrine while in converse with their friends.

Mr. METCALF (Sunderland) was pleased to hear that great progress had been made, although they had still the same complaint—as the Presbyterians had had at the recent Synod—that they could not retain the people who were occasionally brought to their places of worship. The reason of this was that the services were too Puritanical, and hence they ought to have some better means of catching the roughs from the Quayside and the alleys, as well as the men who were in the habit of committing the greatest amount of depredation. For his own part, having only on the previous day seen into the Roman Catholic Cathedral, he was convinced that the Unitarians lost a great deal of power by not making their services more interesting and more fascinating. It was their duty to worship God beautifully, and no harm could possibly arise from having the singing and chanting as sweetly rendered as it was by the Catholics.

Mr. LEE commented severely on some remarks recently made by the Rev. Mr. Pattison, of Newcastle, in the course of an address delivered at an Independent soiree at Barnardcastle, that Unitarians taught them how to have icebergs in the middle of summer. (Laughter.) These remarks ought never to have been made, as he himself had told the utterer, as they only prevented the good feeling which ought to exist amongst the professors of all faiths.

The CHAIRMAN then intimated that the discussion on all the papers must be considered successful, and trusted great good would result from their deliberations. Although no resolutions had been passed, they were all certain to adopt the various suggestions made for the more efficient carrying on of the mission, and would be able to detail their practicability at the next conference, which it was intended to hold annually. They must all agree that it was necessary for the public services of the church to be made as attractive as possible. A place of worship should be the most beautiful of all places, and he would himself have, if sufficient funds could be raised for the purpose, the best pictures of the greatest painters to hang along his chapel walls. The altar or communion table should contain, day by day, the symbol of God's great goodness in flower, and fern, and leaflet, in order that they might speak in their own beauty and glory to the worshippers gathered together; while he would not have it considered any breach of etiquette for the greatest singers to assist at their services, as he thought their talent might certainly be enlisted in the praise of God as well as for the gratification of large multitudes of their fellows. (Applause.)

The business of the conference then terminated with prayer.

The annual soiree of the Northumberland and Durham Missionary Association was afterwards held in the large schoolroom connected with the church. The attendance was large. At the public meeting after the tea, the Rev. J. C. Street presided, and delivered an address on "Religious Thought beyond the pale of Christendom." Addresses were delivered by Dr. Lunge, the Rev. E. W. Hopkinson, the Rev. Thomas Leyland, the Rev. Wm. Elliott, the Rev. Wm. Brunton, Dr. Gammage, Mr. Joseph Lee, Mr. Robert Elliott, and Mr. T. Brown. Their conjoint addresses treated on religious thought in Europe, Great Britain, and America, and Northumberland and Durham; Church organisation, Sunday schools and the church, state of Unitarianism in Sunderland, Choppington, Crook, and Barnardcastle the addresses being agreeably interspersed with music the evening was spent very pleasantly and profitably.

INTELLIGENCE.

MINISTERIAL APPOINTMENTS.—The Rev. William Mitchell, of Leicester, has accepted a unanimous invitation to become the minister of the Accrington congregation in connection with the East Lancashire Unitarian Association, and will enter upon his duties in November next. The Rev. J. Kertain Smith, of Newchurch, has also accepted a unanimous invitation to become the minister of the congregation at Flowery Field.

DUNDEE.—After several disappointments the congregation have secured a building site at the corner of Mid-street and Constitution-road. In all probability the building operations will be begun immediately. Experience has shown that schools will be necessary, and accordingly the design of the building includes the basement story for that purpose. The services held in the Thistle Hall continue to be well attended, the congregation is becoming consolidated, and now presents most of the features of an old established Unitarian congregation. The erection of a chapel it is confidently believed will help to strengthen the cause very much in this important town and district. A series of weekly meetings are being held in another district of the town from the Thistle Hall, not with the view of starting a second congregation, but to invite those who may attend to the regular Sunday services. There has been an average attendance of about 60. A number of zealous energetic laymen are always ready to second the minister's efforts to make this attempt to establish a Unitarian congregation in Dundee a success.

ILKESTON: OPENING OF THE NEW CHAPEL.—The above place of worship was opened for divine service on Thursday the 14th instant, when two appropriate sermons were preached by the Rev. R. A. Armstrong, B.A., of Nottingham. The opening services were continued on the following Sunday, when two excellent sermons were preached by the Rev. T. R. Elliott, of Hunslet, who was formerly, for some time, minister of the old chapel at Ilkeston.

The total amount collected on both days was £25. 2s. 2d. On Monday evening, after partaking of tea, a public meeting was held, when the chair was taken by the Rev. W. Shakespeare, minister of the place, who gave a sketch of the history of the old chapel, so far as the facts, in the absence of any regular record, could be ascertained; and contrasted the times in which the old chapel was erected, viz., about the year 1719, when, though liberty of worship was allowed, it was comparatively insecure, with the times of wider and more settled freedom in which the new building had been erected.—The Rev. A. W. Worthington, B.A., gave some additional particulars connected with the history of the old chapel, showed the value and importance of the various institutions of a Christian Church, not excepting those of a ceremonial kind, and pointed out the desirableness and necessity of seeking to establish a more flourishing condition in the finances of the place, now that so many of the old obstacles had been removed.—The Rev. C. C. Coe spoke on the question of education; and, whilst not failing highly to estimate the voluntary principle, defended compulsory education as the great educational want of the present day, to be paid for by a rate, supplemented by Government grants. He advocated a purely secular education, or, if the Bible be admitted at all, that it must be strictly without note or comment, which cannot be the case so long as the present chapter headings, which contain theological interpretations of the text, are allowed to remain.—The Rev. C. L. Whitham, of Nottingham, related an incident of the previous Thursday, when several visitors who had come to the opening services, went into the old parish church close by, to take a view of the interior, when they were accosted by the clergyman who officiates in the place. Being informed that they had come to the services connected with the opening of a new place of worship just under his sheltering wing, he at once denied the correctness of the description they had given of the relative position of the two places of worship, and informed them that he and his friends were sailing over the sea of time in the ship of life, but that the Unitarians had chosen "to paddle their own canoe." Whilst he (Mr. Whitham) could not admit that the Church or Orthodoxy constituted the sole ark of safety, he could not deny that, to some extent, our position as Unitarians was correctly described.—The Revs. G. Wooler, of Newark, and T. R. Elliott, also gave earnest and suitable addresses. In course of the meeting, Mr. H. Barker, of Ilkstone, gave a suitable reading, and Mr. O. Aves, of Mansfield, some practical counsels appropriate to the occasion. The meeting was brought to a close with singing and prayer.

KIRKCALDY.—The Unitarian minister of Dundee has given three lectures in this town, and has found a number of persons who are prepared to accept the Unitarian position. His lectures are always attentively listened to, and although opportunity is afforded for discussion, it is seldom that very strong objection is offered.

LONDON: CARTER-LANE.—The annual meeting of the reading room connected with this place was held on Monday evening last. After tea, at which about 170 persons were present, Frederick Nettlefold, Esq., took the chair, and was supported by Messrs. I. M. Wade, I. S. Lister, and the Rev. J. Taylor. Reports were read showing the state of the society, and detailing the work done during the past twelve months. On the whole they were very satisfactory. The evening was then given up to singing and reciting,—the different pieces being most excellently performed. Besides being the annual meeting, this was also the opening meeting of the sixth series of fortnightly penny readings.

MOTTRAM.—On Saturday evening last, the cricket club in connection with the Sunday-school held its annual tea party, when about eighty were present. After tea Mr. S. Wyatt presided, and made a few pithy and appropriate remarks on the duty of cricketers as Sunday-school teachers. Mr. Sidebottom then said a few words, after which the remainder of the evening was spent in amusements.

CORRESPONDENCE.

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

We have been compelled to hold over several Intelligence paragraphs till next week.

The Gellionen Meeting.—We have received a letter from the correspondent who furnished us with this report, pointing out that Mr. Jones's long explanation in our last really justifies, instead of contradicts, our original statement "that he endeavoured to reconcile the sentiments of those who differed." So, we confess, it seems to us, and therefore, though we have allowed his letter of explanation and the one we insert this week, we cannot admit anything further on the subject.

Although we have not felt ourselves in a position to refuse their advertisement, we deeply regret to see that some of the friends heretofore connected with the Rochdale Road Mission, Manchester, dissatisfied with the way in which the recently appointed missionary, the Rev. B. Walker, is working to gather in the very poorest of the neighbouring population, are attempting to start a new meeting room in the vicinity. Against their withdrawing from the mission we have not a word to say, but there are other chapels within a short distance which they might have joined, and to set up another in the neighbourhood seems to us a step utterly uncalled for and unjustifiable.

REVELATION.

To the Editors.—Owing to a domestic affliction, I was unable at the time to notice a remark in the report of the Gellionen meeting, in your issue of the 8th instant. I refer to the paragraph which states that I "held that it [revelation] could be reduced under the laws of the mind; that the revelation of the New Testament is just of the same nature as that which has been revealed in science and literature by Newton and Shakespeare." &c. The writer of the report (with no bad intention I feel sure) has given to the public a very imperfect account of what I said. My views on the question, briefly expressed at the meeting, were these: That what we call Revelation can be brought within the scope of mental laws, equally with any other mental operations; that the laws of human nature can and ought to be so defined as to include the intellectual processes and the spiritual emotions of which the Jewish and Christian Scriptures are the product; and that the distinction between natural and revealed religion is one without a difference, since all so-called natural religion must be revealed or disclosed to man's faculties, or else remain a dead letter, and all so-called revealed religion must be in harmony with the laws of our moral and spiritual nature.

The names of Newton and Shakespeare were brought in because an objection had been raised to the following effect: how was it that the glorious doctrines of Christianity were vouchsafed to Jesus Christ, and to no one else? I held this question to be beside the point, and maintained it might be equally asked by believers in a supernatural or in a natural revelation. Questions of this kind might be asked without end: how happened it that it was given to Newton and to no one else to write the Principia and discover the law of gravitation? How was it that Shakespeare and no one else was commissioned to write those plays which embody the deepest and grandest views of human destiny? It was said that Newton and Shakespeare had some data to go upon, but that Jesus Christ—say, in the prediction of the destruction of Jerusalem—had not; I contend, however, that Jesus Christ had very definite data such as the ascendancy of the Roman power in the country, and the Catholic aim of his Gospel to include Jews and Gentiles in one fold.

My friend, Mr. R. J. Jones, in your last issue is quite right in saying that he did not so much endeavour to reconcile the two conflicting views upon Revelation, as to set before the audience the definitions and fundamental premises special to each. He also quite expresses my sentiments with respect to the more important question connected with Revelation: that both parties are together in regard for the doctrines of religion and obedience to the spiritual laws of the divine life in Christ. How a revelation came is after all a point of minor importance; that we should all alike learn its lessons, rejoice in its consolations, and exert ourselves with God's help, to discharge the duty it imposes on us, appears to me to be the one thing needful.—Yours faithfully,
Llandysul, Oct. 19, 1869. WILLIAM THOMAS.

THE THEOLOGICAL TENDENCIES OF THE AGE.

To the Editors.—Considering the innumerable enactments for the elevation, instruction, and improvement of man, fought for by enthusiastic politicians and divines through all ages of the earth's history, we might almost have expected the world to be paradisaical ere this, and yet our philanthropists had never their hands so full as at present, and are quite cognisant that progress and reform are as prominent features in the programme of the future as they were ever in that of the past. Touching the theological tendencies, nothing I think can be clearer than—as the writer of the leader in 1st October Herald, entitled "Our Unitarian Faith," said—"that its (Unitarian) essential principles, whatever may become of its name or ecclesiastical organisation, will one day become the religion of Christendom," for, as the Herald has previously stated, Unitarianism is in theology what Liberalism is in politics; but on account of the great peculiarity of religious bigotry and prejudice, and our lack of collecting those who virtually do belong to us, we are very far—in name at least—from occupying the same position. Never, however, were either civil or religious liberty making such strides as at present. Archbishop Manning may talk about the Supreme Judgship of the Pope—may sound forth that most wonderful of all so-called Christian doctrines of worshipping his Creator by regarding as something infernally dangerous, and to be cast away, forsworn, or changed for whatever may be at the bidding of any one who happens, by the sheerest fallible circumstances, to come in possession of a certain diadem, the noblest gift with which he has endowed us; the channel through which has flowed every blessing, every reform, either social, political, or religious, we now enjoy—"the action of our intellect." Others who have cast these shackles only to don chains but little less superstitious and slavish, although acknowledging the benefit and success of each reformed decree when they have been too plainly and practically established to admit of the least possible doubt, may enter the usual splenetic protest against another course, and at every succeeding one, may be the loudest to expose the fallacy of their own former, deplorable predictions, by asserting that the constitution is now perfectly sound and will not stand any more change of diet; and others, who it must be said are among our greatest political reformers, may cling to the ancestral notion that the authors of our popular credenda, although so miserably unfit to dictate to us in matters political, were infallible in theology,—may appropriate State money to teach that God governs His children by laws which if any one of us, as far as we have power exemplified in managing the children of our own household, we should, by all the laws of civilisation, be forthwith treated as being too infamous or lunatic to be at large. What can we say of the man who, directly after his promising and blissful nuptials, commenced to prepare a place of torture the most awful and monstrous his mind could possibly devise, for the reception of his first-born or such other of his offspring as might in any way offend him, and that because one of them did, under their parents' own temptation, slightly forget itself, the whole family only escaped this Tartarean torture by the father—to appease his wrath and to bring those very divergent properties, his justice and mercy, into union—demanding and inflicting a debasing and severe punishment on his pious, loving, and devoted, and dearly-beloved helpmate; and, although counselling his daughters to pursue the path of purity, gave unrestricted access into their company to one of the vilest, yet wildest and most dangerous characters to be found in the darkest dens of iniquity; and those who were weak enough to be led aside, although their own rod whipped them severely, he was obliged through his great fatherly justice to consign them to this—not everlasting, but life-long agony and torment; and to teach that so far from us taking a lesson from the life of our Great Master, we might as well expect to find grapes on thistles as anything good in the hearts of mankind; and that touching our salvation, if it was possible for our lives to be models of purity, that would be totally unavailing. Such beliefs which have naturally enough, if not caused, accompanied all the theological monstrosities of old, which prompt the Indian fanatics to continue their swinging festivals and other horrible practices, and which for the most part feed this country's present religious animosities, are as surely before light, intelligence, waning as the darkness is eclipsed by the dawn. It is, however, unfortunate that numbers who have discarded creeds which rebel so much against their reason are yet ignorant of the existence of any rational form of worship, and thus lose the soul-stirring and benign influence of the pulpit and orchestra. For this, or much of it, Unitarians, as the body who do recommend liberty of conscience, are responsible.

WHAT THE CHURCHES ARE DOING.

The Ceylon Observer describes the taking an inventory of the property of the shrine in which Budha's tooth is preserved at Kandy. The Government has been compelled to draw up a list of the relics and their values, in connection with the dispute regarding the office of Dewa Nileme, or guardian of the temple. The sacred tooth was uncovered, and attracted attention chiefly from the richly jewelled caskets and trophies surrounding it. The most remarkable object, however, was a figure of Budha about four inches high cut out of what was professedly a single emerald; but most probably is tourmaline. Besides this figure, there were five other Budhas of solid gold, and a book formed of leaves of the same material, on which were engraved the particulars of the treasure in the temple.

The Jewish Record learns with unqualified regret that a party of Greeks have resolved to purchase the plain in the neighbourhood of Bethlehem, where Rachel's grave is situated, for the purpose of erecting a church. This will necessitate the destruction of the home erected in that locality by Sir Moses Montefiore.

The chief meeting place of the Skoptzi sect has, it appears, been at length discovered at Moscow in the house of four brothers named Koudrin. These men had a photographic studio, where the idols worshipped by the Skoptzi were manufactured. The Crown prosecutor has discovered some of the persons employed in this manufacture, who have confessed that the Skoptzi hold their religious meetings in the house at night, and that there is a convent attached to the building. An inquiry has since taken place, from which it appears that the brothers Koudrin have been in the habit of kidnapping children between the ages of eight and twelve, and then forcing them to become members of the sect. The district in which the house is situated is said to be full of Skoptzi, and forty-eight women belonging to the sect have been arrested.

The Pall Mall says one subject which is to engage the attention of the Council is the price of masses in France. At present an ordinary mass costs just a shilling, which the French clergy complain is too low by half. Several curés have memorialised their bishops on the subject, and their reports afford some revelations which are curious as showing that our neighbours, however sceptic in speech, are much less so in action. It seems that, owing to the cheapness of the terms, the number of people who apply to have masses said for them or their departed relatives averages nearly 4,000,000 yearly. Young men who are going to draw at the conscription, young girls who want their love affairs to prosper, old women who have invested money and are afraid of ruin, all these classes are represented, and make up a good third of the total. The result is that in large towns, and especially in Paris, there are more masses ordered than could be recited by twice the number of priests in the diocese, granting even that they officiated incessantly from morning to night; so that it has become a practice to sub-let or farm out the masses to country priests who have more time to spare. For instance, when a person orders at a Paris church one, ten, or as the case may be, several hundred, masses, he pays his money and gives his name; but, unless he be a rich man and pays generously, his masses are not said in Paris. The order is remitted to some poor curé in the provinces, who takes, as it were, a wholesale commission, and recites the masses for about fourpence a piece. It thus often happens that a tradesman who dies in the Rue St. Denis is prayed for, day after day, in the wilds of Languedoc, where nobody has ever seen or heard of him. However, a good number of provincial curés are growing tired of saying masses at second-hand prices; and, as the urban priests maintain that it is impossible to allow them more than one-third of the original fee—the rest being required to defray the great expenses incumbent upon town churches—it is thought that the Council may take the matter into consideration and suffer the fees to be increased.

A correspondent of the Patrie gives the following details respecting the Romish hierarchy:—It is composed of the Pope, as supreme head, the cardinals, patriarchs, archbishops and bishops. By the rules, there ought to be seventy-six cardinals, but that number is rarely attained. At present, for example, the Sacred College is composed of only fifty-nine members, including two hats reserved, in petto, for persons unknown. The oldest of these princes of the Church is eighty-nine, and a Spaniard; and the youngest, forty-two, a Frenchman, Prince Lucien Bonaparte. Among them are four over eighty, thirteen more than seventy, twenty-five who have passed sixty, ten over fifty, and five between that age and forty. Cardinal Antonelli, secretary of state, is sixty-four. The Court of the Vatican, which has not accepted the suppression of certain bishoprics effected in Italy after the unification of that kingdom, reckons somewhat over 1,100 sees in the Catholic world; but in reality they do not quite reach 1,000, for official documents in the Roman archives give the following figures:—Patriarchal dioceses with residence, 747; sees in partibus, 234; total, 981. Out of that number, 281 will probably abstain, for one reason or another, from appearing in the Council, and about 700 will probably be present. Each of these prelates will be accompanied by a theologian, sometimes by two, and have at least one priest for secretary. Many archbishops will arrive with a positive suite, so that the average number of ecclesiastics accompanying each prelate may be taken at three, making, with the bishop, four, and 700 multiplied by four gives 2,800 ecclesiastics. To that figure must be added the mitred abbots, the generals of the religious orders, the theologians summoned by the Pope, and who will take their places in the Council, and a total is arrived at of more than 3,000 members of the clergy specially attached to it. This is not reckoning those whom curiosity may bring, and who will probably be as many more.

The Empress Eugénie the other day, after leaving Venice, set an example which might well be followed by some of our own denomination when they happen to be thrown where humble places of Unitarian worship are to be found. As her yacht reached the village of Malamocco, she went on shore in one of the boats, and heard mass in the fishermen's church, with the poor people around her, and a village priest officiating at the altar.

A Roman Catholic Congress has been sitting at Pesth, the object of which was to introduce a new system of ecclesiastical administration into Hungary. A young abbé, named Kuthy, supported by the patriot Deak, strongly advocated liberal principles, and is now called the Père Hyacinthe of Hungary. The Roman Catholic world, he said, is divided into two parties, one of which aims at recovering for the Church that position of intellectual and moral leadership which it has nearly lost, while the other comes forward as the irreconcilable adversary of liberty; and he openly declared that he belonged to the former party, and trusted that the Congress would range itself on the same side. Though his speech was vehemently attacked by the prelates and other High Church dignitaries, at the next sitting the Cardinal Primate promised that the Hungarian clergy "would keep pace with the progress of the people and the times."

Whether as a preliminary or not to the great Church Council we cannot say, but Civita Vecchia has been the scene of a great miracle. A brigand, guilty of numerous murders, was lately missed from the gaol there, but the police, after a raid on the haunts of crime, succeeded in effecting his recapture. The man now avers that he did not break out of prison, but was taken out by an angel, whom the Madonna, touched by his sufferings, sent to deliver him. He demands an inquiry into the facts and a judicial recognition of the miracle. It will be another miracle if it is not recognised.

In a letter to the Spectator, Miss Cobbe mentions that Keshub Chunder Sen, the leader of the Brahmo Somaj, or Pure Theists of India, intends to visit England this winter, in order, as he says, "to study the progressive movements which are being carried on in that centre of civilisation and enlightenment; and to put forth my humble endeavours to secure the sympathy and interest of liberal-minded persons for the Brahmo Somaj of India, and to extend the circle of Theistic fellowship." Miss Cobbe trusts that there will be found many to offer hospitality on his arrival to the illustrious reformer.

It is stated that Archbishop Manning, in company with Bishop Grant, will set out for Rome next week, and that with two exceptions, caused by ill health, all the English Catholic Bishops intend to be present at the Œcumenical Council.

The Evangelical Alliance will hold their Conference this year at Derby. The business is to commence on the 23rd of November, and last for seven days.

At the Conference of Irish laymen which met to prepare the way for the new organisation of the Church, it was agreed to demand that the representatives of the laity shall be to the clergy as two to one, and that for electors and delegates alike the only necessary qualification shall be a profession of adherence to the Church. It is understood, too, that at a meeting of the clergy of the diocese of Dublin, held under the presidency of Archbishop Trench, the right of the laity to take part in the determination of questions relating to doctrine and discipline was recognised by a decisive majority; but the clergy and the laity are to vote by orders, that is, there will be a second house, representing only an official class, which seems more likely to lessen than to increase their power.

Just at present it may be interesting to state that the Episcopal incomes of the principal sees are as follows: Canterbury, £15,000 a year; York, £10,000; London, £10,000; Durham, £8,000; Winchester, £7,000; Ely, £5,500. The others are worth some £5,000, and others £4,500 or £4,200; that of Sodor and Man being £2,000.

John Locke lies buried in the little country churchyard of High Laver, near Ongar, in Essex. Just sixty years ago a movement was set on foot for erecting a monument in St. Paul's to the philosopher's memory. About £700 was subscribed, and the late Sir R. Westmacott was commissioned to carve a statue in the finest marble, which he actually began. The Guardian would like to know, and so should we, what has become of the statue, and what of the money subscribed.

Dr. Temple's appointment to the See of Exeter is gazetted. And committees of old Rugbeians have been formed in Oxford, Cambridge, and London to determine on the best way of expressing loving respect for him.

At a meeting of the Manchester Branch of the British and Foreign Bible Society on Tuesday evening, it was stated that the Society had spent six and a half millions of money, and circulated 57,000,000 copies of the Holy Scriptures.

The Congregationalists have purchased a site for a new chapel at Cambridge, which is to cost £9,000. A circular which has been issued says:

"The increasing number of Nonconformist students resorting to Cambridge, the steady advance which is being made towards the opening of College fellowships, and the reasonable prospect of the University becoming a really national institution, furnish additional reasons in favour of the proposed undertaking."

A number of the clergy of the diocese of Exeter have appealed to Dr. Temple to repudiate any participation in the alleged heretical opinions of the other writers associated with him in "Essays and Reviews;" but he very properly declines to do so. To allow, he says, that a bishop-designate, or any other person appointed to office in the Church, should be called upon after nomination to make any other declarations than those required by law, would be so serious an infringement of the lawful liberty guaranteed to ministers of the Church that he dare not take the responsibility of giving it a sanction in his own case. He regrets that so much anxiety and excitement should have been caused by his appointment; but he feels confident that "personal intercourse will dissipate most of this uncomfortable feeling."

WHAT IS SAYING ON CHURCH MATTERS.

The Bishop of Montreal, who is at present in Rome, has been telling this story there:

"A Catholic missionary was preaching to an Indian tribe in the extreme north of America, when a packet of letters was given to him, on opening one of which he burst into tears. The chief of the tribe asked him the reason. The missionary replied, 'It is because I learn from it that my father is dead, and many other misfortunes.' 'But,' said the chief, 'thou hast told us that in such circumstances we should not weep, but submit with resignation to the will of the Great Spirit; so to give us an example smoke this pipe with us and be comforted.' The missionary did so at once, and went on opening his letters, among which was a copy of the Bull of Convocation for the Council. 'You have also good news,' said the chief, seeing the priest's joy in his face; 'Let us hear that also.' 'The good news,' said the missionary, 'is that the Grand Master of Prayer has called the other Masters of Prayer to aid and counsel him.' 'What is his name?' said the chief. 'Pius IX.' 'Am I worthy to name that name?' said the simple warrior. 'Yes,' said the priest; 'rise all of you, and call upon the Great Spirit to bless him.' The savages all did so with the deepest testimonies of respect and reverence, and, in imitation of the missionary, one after the other kissed the name of the Holy Father printed at the foot of the Bull. The missionary then explained to them what the Council was, and how the crimes of the world had made it necessary; and the chief, raising his hands to heaven, exclaimed, 'May the Great Spirit aid Pius IX. in all his designs.'

With regard to Father Hyacinthe, it is stated in Rome, that the Pope has received a letter from the Archbishop of Paris representing his motives for not fulminating his censures against the refractory Carmelite. The letter is to the effect that the Archbishop hopes to recall him to a better frame of mind. Among those who advocate gentle measures is Monsignor de Mérode, who, while blaming the great preacher, bitterly denounces the violent men who have rendered a retraction almost impossible.

There is a belief in Rome that there is a disposition among the ritualistic clergy of England to attend the Council, and it is said that Pio Nono has commissioned Father Frappel to treat with these lost sheep, and to give a liberal interpretation to the Papal letter to Dr. Manning in the Cumming affair.

Dr. Trench has been recommending a resistance on the part of the Irish clergy to a general communion, unless reasonable guarantees are given that there shall be no serious attempt to depress the clergy into a position of mere subordination, or to alter the Prayer Book and Articles. The Telegraph doubts the success of his appeal as regards the latter point. For, after all, to what does his advice amount? He says, "You differ, and are likely to differ so thoroughly on points of doctrine and dogma, that your only hope of unity is to accept in silence the Prayer Book as it is, and the Articles as they are." This certainly secures to the new church a dead uniformity of assent—but does it secure a living unity of active belief? For the last thirty years we have heard outcries from "Protestants" that the Prayer Book contains passages too Popish for their taste; while they have denounced the Articles as not condemning with sufficient clearness some heresies not exactly anticipated when those formularies were framed. Now they have an opportunity, if they choose, to omit all that is Papistical in forms of public worship, and to frame condemnatory clauses that will cut the ground from under the feet of Colensoites and Oyseyites; but Dr. Trench lifts up his warning hands, and says, "Don't! you do not understand theology; you would only quarrel and dissolve; for the sake of union take the Prayer Book and hold your tongues. In the Church's name I charge you all to drop your swords and daggers." The appeal may be successful, but the Telegraph greatly doubts such an issue. When Irish Protestants once meet to discuss theology, it will be difficult to make them "go off kneeling," each with the Book of Common Prayer reverently held before his eyes.

The Pall Mall, after remarking that one of the most interesting topics of discussion at the Congregational Union was the admission of Dissenters to the University, says:

"Hitherto the agitation has principally come from within. The Established Church has a firm hold of some very comfortable and dignified endowments at Oxford and Cambridge, and the natural instinct of its members is to protest against anybody else stepping in to share them. The Radical minority who propose a less exclusive policy are, therefore, regarded as traitors in the camp. They are little better than covert infidels, seeking an alliance with the enemy, or endeavouring to throw the doors open, not so much with a liberal desire for the admission of the external world as from a dislike to certain tests which press awkwardly upon their own consciences. They are supposed to wish their hearts to destroy the Christian character of the Universities, and to make way rather for Unitarists and Freethinkers of all schools than for Baptists or Methodists. People who take this view of the case would do well to consider fairly the argument put forward by Dissenters. If infidelity so rampant as is sometimes represented, might not be worth while to call in Dissenters as allies instead of enemies? And is there not a chance that their admission to the colleges might be more favourable to conversions to the orthodox ranks than to desertions from them? If these questions be answered in the affirmative—and something may certainly be said for them—it is obvious that the Church would probably derive fresh strength from an abolition of the cherished tests. The policy of protection may really be doing as little genuine service to its supporters in this case as in that of the farmers."

On the idea which some advocated of providing separate Halls for different creeds, the same paper observes:

"No arrangement could possibly be worse. A Baptist college in Oxford, for example, would at once have a black mark against it. Its students would be pariahs. Even if they succeeded in winning high places in class lists, the young gentlemen who consider a seat in the university boat as the highest of human honours would regard them, to use their own pleasant language, as 'snobs' or 'cads,' and would have their hatred of Dissent stimulated by the visible presence of its representatives. The very object for which it is most desirable to throw down existing barriers would be defeated, and the narrow spirit of religious exclusiveness receive an additional stimulus. The more liberal-minded portion of the Dissenters are fully sensible of this, and are inclined to insist upon the only measure which can be really satisfactory, the entire abolition of all religious tests in our national universities. An admixture of promising youths from the Dissenting bodies would be a good thing not merely as softening senseless prejudices, but as introducing a class of students who would have strong motives for valuing intellectual labour more highly than is the fashion at present. The Universities are expensive because the class from which they are chiefly recruited is extravagant; and a few poor men who really came to learn would be of service to the general tone of the studies. But if they were locked up as inferior beings in a separate institution the effect would be simply pernicious, and would simply intensify existing animosities."

Martin Farquhar Tupper has been writing to the Rock "A Few Words about Animals' Hereafter," in which there are some things as curious as his "Proverbial Philosophy." "It would be easy," he says, "to multiply instances of every social virtue and cleverness illustrated by birds, beasts, and fishes; from shrewd elephants to industrious fleas; from Colonel Berkeley's cormorant, who died of grief, to Lesbia's sparrow, whose love for her is classical; from the affectionate, if unwieldy, whale to the gregarious carps of St. Cloud." It is Mr. Tupper's faith that all these talents and virtues, the grief of the cormorant, and, we must conclude, the industry of Mr. Kitchingham's lively pupils, are not to disappear in the ordinary course of nature. Our planet is to be regenerated for "earth's spiritualised children," and so arranged that there will be room and to spare for the friendly brutes; a provision will be made even for unborn chickens, for we are assured that "every egg will find room to hatch." As a lion with his old leaven in him for carnal food would not be an altogether comfortable guest in Mr. Tupper's Elysium, he calms our fears by kindly informing us that the chances are that a spirit-lion will be satisfied with plain straw like an ox, and considering what chemistry has done here below in the way of extracting perfumes from unpromising substances, he believes that even a polecat can be etherealised into a fragrant creature of good odour and conduct. A brother poet has spoken of the hope the Indian has of his faithful dog bearing him company in the happy hunting-grounds, and the Proverbial Philosopher is convinced that the redskin had Scriptural sanction for his idea.

In one of his sermons, speaking of the last Continental war, Father Hyacinthe, whose "revolt" has created such a sensation, expressed himself thus heretically:

"Do you know why Prussia triumphed in the field of battle? 'Twas not because there was a lack of bravery on either side; it was not the effect of the most wondrous weapon for the acquisition of which men are so eager; but it was because the assailant was better educated than the assailed, and had a superior religious training; it was because every Prussian soldier had a Bible in his cap or helmet. In other places I have asserted, and I assert it here again, that that which constitutes the strength of Protestant nations is, that when the people come home from their work they enter the family circle, and sitting by their hearths they read the Bible and the national poetry. We are behindhand with Protestant nations, and especially with those that dwell beyond the Atlantic and the Straits of Dover. I have trodden English soil on two occasions, and have come to the conviction that the strength of that country is from the Bible."

On the opposition to Dr. Temple's appointment, the Church Times says:

"When we see the Record and the John Bull weeping affectionately over each other's shoulders upon this question, and that in the largest-sized tears, which in printer's language would be expressed by leaded leader type, Churchmen cannot help being suspicious. There is not a little reason to believe that much of the agitation against Dr. Temple has been got up as a political dodge. It is scarcely likely that we should take a line in opposition to that of so many men whose opinion we generally respect if we were not fairly assured that Dr. Temple's orthodoxy is at least as sound as that of Archbishop Tait—while in almost every other respect he is infinitely his superior—against whose appointment by Mr. Disraeli no such outcry was raised by the Tory press."

With the heading "Head and Tail of Intolerance," Punch has the following:

"So, my Lord Shaftesbury, so, Dr. Pusey, you two opposite partisans agree in striving to prevent, if possible, Dr. Temple from being made Bishop of Exeter. O, Earl of Shaftesbury, what has Dr. Temple done? Written an essay, which but for its literary quality, might have been written by yourself—or by Dr. Pusey. What has he not done? Dr. Temple has never spouted fanaticism, like one of whom it may have been said: 'Mis se jactet in aula'—Exeter, to wit. He never applied strong language to a mild, good book, which somebody else said was ejected from the jaws of a place not mentionable to ears polite. O, Dr. Pusey, what has not been done by Dr. Temple? No heresy, so pronounced by his University, has been preached by him. No distinctly Roman doctrine has been avowed. Dr. Temple is the leader and denominator of no sect which is constantly endeavouring to Romanise the English Church, and occasionally supplying recruits to Rome. Toleration, Lord Shaftesbury; toleration, Dr. Pusey, Dr. E. B. Pusey, or, as some would write you, 'M. B.' Pusey. Are you not as those who live in glass houses? Behave as such."

THE FACTS OF THE IRISH CHURCH.

We take the following details from a letter of M. Louis Blanc to Le Temps:

"Upon the 1st January, 1871, the Irish Protestant Church will cease to exist as a State Church. According to the last census, that of 1861, the population of Ireland amounts to 5,795,835 persons, who are distributed into different sects as follows:

Roman Catholics	4,505,263
Members of the Established Church	693,357
Presbyterians	523,291
Methodists	45,399
Independents	4,532
Baptists	4,237
Quakers	3,695
Jews	395
Other sects	15,666

"Of all the above, the Established Church, that is, the Protestant Episcopal Church, is the only one which, to use the expression of Dr. Ball, enjoys a separate provision from the public funds.

"The Presbyterian Church receives from the House of Commons an annual grant which is known as the Regium Donum, and owes its origin to William III.

"As for the Roman Catholic Church, the Church which possesses 4,505,263 adherents out of a population of but 5,795,835, its priests exist upon the scanty sums paid for marriages, baptisms, masses, &c., by a people dying of hunger.

"Yet Irish Catholicism is not always without help from the State. Before 1795 the law did not permit the endowment of any college or seminary in Ireland for the education of Catholics. The result was that the priests of that religion were educated on the Continent, especially in France. At the time of the French Revolution it was proposed to found a Catholic seminary at Maynooth, the endowment of which, in 1845, under the administration of Sir Robert Peel, was raised from £9,000 a year to £26,360 in spite of all that zealous Protestants could say about the sin of aiding the teaching of superstition and error.

"We will now say a few words upon the wealth of the Protestant Episcopal Church in Ireland, the Church which possesses only 693,357 faithful amongst a population of 5,795,835.

"In the words of the parliamentary report published in 1863, the total revenue of the twelve dioceses governed by the two archbishops of Armagh and Dublin, is not less than £580,416, an income whose capitalised value Mr. Gladstone fixes at £16,000,000.

"So the 669,274 acres of land which the Protestant Church possesses in Ireland, the rents which she receives, the money invested for her, and the tithe-rent charge which the Protestant landlords pay, amount to sixteen million pounds sterling.

"On the 28th March, 1865, Mr. Dillwyn remarked in the House of Commons that in the space of sixty-four years the Archbishop of Armagh found he had received £177,580. Are his services in accordance with his salary? How can that be in a place where so many shepherds have but the shadow of a flock? One reads in a pamphlet by Archdeacon Stopford that there is in Ireland an union or assemblage of parishes whose spiritual director receives an income of £330 for superintending the salvation of twenty-four Protestants. There is another such fold that shelters barely seventeen sheep. Is there not cause here to remember the words of Lord Plunkett? Those who really rob the Church are the men who eat her bread without working for it?

"Is it astonishing, after this, that the Irish Catholic regards with jealousy the wealth of the dominant clergy, which contrasts so strikingly with the poverty of the nation's clergy? Is it astonishing that the mere sight of empty churches, belonging—empty as they are—to a privileged religion, awakens, in the broken spirit of the poor Irish peasant, the recollection of centuries of subjection, and ages of spoliation?"

"Let us now see by what state of affairs the Irish Church Act will replace that which I have just described.

"First, the Irish Episcopal Church loses its privilege of being a Church established by the State; it is disestablished. After the 1st January, 1871, it will be detached from the State, and the archbishops and bishops, who are at its head, will no longer sit in the House of Lords. Upon this point the reform will be complete.

"Again, the Episcopal Church ceases to be endowed, at least in an official and permanent manner, by the State; it is, except a part—but that a large part—disendowed. Its ministers, whether rectors or curates, are to be maintained during their lives in the enjoyment of the income which they now possess; that is, they are to receive an annuity equal to that income; this annuity they will not receive from the State, it will be paid to them by commissioners specially appointed to complete the work of disestablishment at discretion, as the situation permits, and as justice requires. The members of the Irish Episcopal clergy will enjoy annuities taken from special funds; but they will no longer have any lands to farm, or possess livings; nor will they have any right to receive the rent charges which represent the ancient ecclesiastical tax of tithes.

"The capitalised value of the annuities which the bill ensures to the bishops, rectors, &c., composing the Irish Episcopal clergy, is estimated at £4,900,000.

"Here is given up to her a sum of £4,900,000, out of a capital of £16,000,000, the wealth she has possessed up to the present date.

"She receives, in addition, as the value of endowments received, or supposed to have been received, from private munificence since 1660, the very respectable sum of £500,000.

"The churches will remain in her possession.

"The same may be said of the houses and their appurtenances. Those who now occupy them will continue to do so, upon paying £232,335, a sum which, if the calculations of Dr. Hall are correct, will cover the expenses of maintenance, repair, and rebuilding.

"Lastly, £800,000 are laid aside for the curates."

From the compromise which has taken place, in consequence of the negotiations between Lord Cairns and Lord Granville, it has been agreed that, when in a diocese three-fourths of the clergy wish to exchange their annuities for their realised value, the capital to be paid them shall be calculated with an addition of 12 per cent. to the ordinary value, 7 per cent. as estimating the life of a clergyman at a greater value than that of other men, and 5 per cent in order to encourage the exchange.

REVIEW.

Francois d'Assise: Etude Historique d'apres Karl Hase. Par Charles Berthoud. Paris, 1869.

To many Englishmen, as well as Frenchmen, Hase's interesting work will be rendered accessible for the first time by M. Berthoud's translation. It fills an important blank in ecclesiastical history. Not indeed that so interesting a topic as the life of the founder of the first order of mendicants had been left untouched; independently of works written from a purely ecclesiastical point of view, the writings of Ozanam and Montalembert, and more especially Frédéric Morin's interesting estimate of the social bearings of S. Francis's labours, have rendered the subject familiar. But until Hase's book appeared, we had no trustworthy biography, written from the standpoint of the scientific historian.

From the darkness of the Middle Ages the figure of S. Francis shines out amid a halo of love and charity. In the vast crowd of mediæval saints he stands especially distinguished by his wide sympathies and his tender pity. To him luxury seemed to be a robbery of our fellow-men; wealth, a treason to our Christ. Self-devotion, self-abandonment were his sole ambition, his chosen aim in life. From his youth he lived in dreams and visions, and deemed these outbursts of his ardent soul to be revelations from the lips of God. To obey their guidance he renounced his family and the world, and embraced a life of misery and privation. To imitate Christ's life of poverty was his ideal, and the ideal of his disciples. "It is harder," said he, "to go to heaven from the palace than from the hut. You must come naked to the arms of the Saviour. Poverty is a hidden treasure; and to gain it is well worth the loss of all one has. It is the supreme virtue, the seal of the elect, for the Son of God for our sakes became poor. He who offends the poor offends Christ; for the poor are the image of Christ and of his poor mother. To beg is a worship, a worship of life, a worship specially divine."

But though he sought alms, it was not to hoard them; all was at once given to the poor. In one time of dearth S. Francis speaks of robbing the Virgin's altar of its last ornaments. In another, finding himself without resources, he gave a poor woman the Bible which the monks used in the choir. "Let her sell it," said he; "God will have more pleasure in seeing her misery relieved than in hearing us read the Bible in the choir."

Yet in spite of the great importance he attached to poverty, he did not hold that austerity and physical denial could ensure salvation. "Let no one," he says, "pride himself on things which the wicked also can do. The wicked can fast and pray, weep and crucify the flesh; of only one thing are they incapable—faithfulness to the Master."

So wide and sympathetic was his nature that he embraced all creation in an equal love, and treated plants and animals with an affection that almost moves our smiles. Everywhere he saw the hand of God; to all things did he feel linked by common brotherhood. Worms he would carefully put out of the way of danger; he delighted in the flowers of the field, which recalled to him the Flower of Jesse, whose perfume has awakened thousands of men from death. Legend, of course, has borrowed these facts, and exaggerated them. We are told of animals that followed him and obeyed him. On a fig-tree near his cell a grasshopper encouraged him to prayer, and came upon his hand at his call. "Sing, sister grasshopper," said he, "and praise God with thy joyous song;" and it sung until he sent it back to its fig-tree. Then there was a wolf which devastated the neighbourhood of Gubbio. "Brother Wolf," said Francis to it, "thou worriest the creatures of God, thou art a murderer. 'Tis hunger that hath driven thee to thy crimes; promise that if thou art fed thou wilt sin no more." The wolf bowed its head in token of assent, and at the saint's request put its paw into his hand. Thenceforth, begging food from house to house, the wolf lived a domestic and moral life.

We can well understand that a saint so venerated as he, could not live in mediæval times without working many miracles. By prayer and the laying-on of hands he is said to have cured paralytics, given sight to the blind, and cast out devils. Hase points out that records are preserved only of the cases in which his efforts succeeded; but that in these, even after full abatement of legendary additions has been made, we can see the immense effect produced by the presence of a man like S. Francis, in whom the sufferers felt perfect confidence, and the strange power exercised by men in whom the spiritual element is supreme. Either of these causes would suffice to work miracles.

But even after his death many prodigies were attributed to him. We are assured that the invocation of his name had power to raise a dead man. Again, a watchman falling from his tower, continued to sleep, dreaming that he was in the arms of the saint.

The greatest of his miracles was, however, worked not by, but upon him:—that of the sacred wounds. Lost in the contemplation of Christ's sufferings, he saw in a vision a seraph, who impressed on his body the marks of the five wounds of the crucified Saviour. Of the history of this miracle the appendix to the book before us gives a curious account, showing the growth of the legend by the accumulation and exaggeration of its details. But, as M. Berthoud says, S. Francis has nothing to lose by this scepticism. His greatness is of himself, and not of his miracles. Ceasing to regard him as either the worker or the subject of prodigies, we shall love him as much—or all the more—for his true glory, his absolute devotion to his life's idea, the passionate love of God, and of all His creatures. Without great genius, his greatness of heart supplied its place and ranked him amidst the leaders of his race. From criticism he has nothing to fear; and his brow will still be holy in our eyes, though the miraculous halo play no more around it.

THE NATIONAL EDUCATION LEAGUE.

WHILE the interest awakened by the recent educational conference in Birmingham is still fresh in the public mind, we wish to draw attention to the particular aims of this association, which must, by the way, be carefully distinguished from the National Education Union, a feeble attempt at a rival association, which a clergyman in the neighbourhood of Manchester is endeavouring to form, on the basis of patching up the existing denominational system. It is especially important at the present time that there should be no division in the camp of those who wish to see a really national system of education, and we will therefore briefly state the programme of the National Education League, which we commend to the support of our readers.

In the first place, since voluntary effort has failed, and necessarily failed altogether in a large number of cases, to provide the required schools, the League proposes to supplement voluntary effort in these cases by compulsory rating, wherever it is proved that there is not sufficient school accommodation. Since, however, a heavy rate would be an excessive burden on those poor districts where it would most frequently have to be made, it is to be supplemented in a large proportion, no less than two-thirds, by a grant from Government. By this very simple means the first requirement of education, sufficient school accommodation, can, it is clear, be completely met, without throwing any greater burden on even the poorest district than its people may fairly be expected to bear in the interest of their children. Further, although the system proposed is purely supplementary in the outset, it provides machinery for taking over any of the present schools that choose to be put upon the rating plan. It may be that a natural law would operate to turn the supplementary system into one that should supplant the other, as people might refuse to pay subscriptions as well as rates for education, and prefer only to take their fair share in the payment of the latter, but that would be an indirect consequence rather than the direct purpose of a system of which the aim is in no sense aggressive, except on ignorance.

On the religious difficulty, around which the great education controversy has ever been waged, the position taken up by the League is very simple and very clear. It meets it by relegating to altogether other agencies the religious teaching that creates it. After adopting rating as its basis, could it without the grossest injustice take any other course? It would never be tolerated for a moment in this country that rates should be levied on Roman Catholics to teach Protestantism, or on Protestants to teach Catholicism, or on Independents to train up children in the Establishment, or on members of the Establishment to train up Independents. A system of education based on rating must be unsectarian, or it would raise again the ghost of the old church-rate grievance. And so manifold are the differences of doctrine prevalent in this country, that a system truly and honestly unsectarian must be one practically secular. The League accordingly has decided that in its schools no dogmatic or theological instruction shall be given and no creeds or catechisms used. It does not exclude the Bible, but would have it read only without note or comment. A short opening service would be allowed, but the painful sham which at present passes for religious teaching in day-schools is to be altogether excluded.

We need say very little on the next point in the programme of the League. Their schools must be free. Having paid the rates for their establishment and maintenance, the ratepayers, it says, should have a right to use them without further payment. The education given there should accordingly be as freely at the disposal of the ratepayer as the streets he walks, and the lamps which light them. Granted the plan of rating at all, the necessity of this seems self-evident.

Even if it were not so, however, the fact that the League takes its stand for compulsory education, makes the adoption of the free system almost a necessity. Compulsory attendance in itself will be hard enough to secure, compulsory payment of fees would be infinitely harder. But this compulsory attendance is the only cornerstone of the system of the League. It is that without which it regards all else as vain. It is that without which its first step cannot be taken, namely, rating for the establishment of schools. It would be out of the question to rate a district for an object which would not be secured; and the education of all the children of the district would never be secured without compulsory attendance. Just as you must provide that there shall be schools, and good ones too, before you can compel parents to send children to them, so, if the schools are provided out of the rates, we must see that we get our money's worth in the fulfilment of our object. But apart from the necessity of compulsory attendance as a sequel to compulsory rating, it is, in the eye of the League, the one necessity in itself. It is intolerable, it holds, that selfish and unnatural parents should be allowed, with impunity, to deny their children their dearest rights. If there be no schools, of course parents are not to blame in the matter, but if, as the League proposes, there is to be provided school-accommodation for every child in England and Wales, then there must be no hesitation in telling every parent—"Neglect to send your children to school at your own peril. Their minds are in your keeping no less than their bodies, the law compels you to see that both alike are fed."

Such is an outline of the machinery, with a few of the reasons for its adoption, whereby the National Education League proposes to accomplish an aim which demands, before all others, the attention of Englishmen. Its two cardinal points are, the making parental negligence in the matter of education a punishable offence, and the giving up in the elementary schools the attempt at religious instruction which has long been abandoned in ordinary schools. To this platform we cordially adhere. We look forward to the day when religion shall no longer be rendered an object of contempt by the lessons which at present falsely bear its name. Nor will the cause of education, in our opinion, be more surely served than that of religion, when the latter is released to find its true channels to the children's minds in the church, the Sunday-school, and the home.

THE SEE OF EXETER.

AFTER all the bounce and threatening called forth by the "frightful enormity" of Dr. Temple's appointment to Exeter, the agitation against it may be pronounced a failure, and seems likely to end in vox et præterea nihil. Much as the High and the Low dislike the Broad, it comes out clearly that they dislike each other not less, and cannot join hands even in holy warfare against it. Dr. McNeile does not hesitate to say that since Dr. Pusey published his "Eirenicon," he has "considered him more really dangerous to the best interests of our reformed Church than two Dr. Temples;" and adds, "I see what I consider two poison cups. The one is labelled poison, the other syrup. The one honestly proclaims its warning; to drink of it is wilfully suicidal. The other dishonestly conceals its deadly drug, enticing the unwary by a honeyed edge." And as this allegory is not sufficient to satisfy him, he draws out at length an example from the Mosaic law. Moses pronounced that a man entirely covered with leprosy was ritually clean, because no body would be likely to touch him. A man, on the other hand, with less unequivocal symptoms was held to be unclean, because less manifest, and so more dangerous. That is, in the opinion of the Dean, we may call Dr. Temple's doctrines poison, and Dr. Pusey's concealed poison; or we may say, if we please, that Dr. Temple is leprous all over, whilst Dr. Pusey can still conceal his leprosy under his ecclesiastical robes. Mr. Hobart Seymour thinks it altogether unworthy of Evangelicals to interfere in the quarrels of Rationalists and Ritualists, and counsels his friends to let such "potsherds of the earth" as Dr. Pusey and Dr. Temple strive with one another without taking any part in the strife. Dean Close is indignant even at the supposition that he should have been capable of uniting with the leader of the High Church party, and though he dislikes the bishop-designate as much as any one can do, he "cannot see the wisdom or consistency of joining with the chief representatives of one class of error in order to put down another." And Lord Shaftesbury's decision, after "sleeping over" the matter, is that he cannot act "in unison" with the Oxford Professor, and that they had better strike at their common object separately. His position reminds the Pall Mall of a singular custom prevailing in some wandering Mohammedan race. When two neighbour tribes have been long engaged in a desperate feud, and are getting rather tired of bloodshed and mutual robbery, the respectable veterans of each side agree on terms of reconciliation. A camel is procured—the camel, no doubt, of a third party whose consent is not asked—and regarded by each tribe as representing the enemy. The tribes stand apart, and spears are thrust into the animal from both sides, each thrust accompanied by an accusation, "You killed my father," "You stole my mare," "You defiled the grave of my mother," "You uttered blasphemy against the Prophet," and so forth, until the unhappy victim is killed outright. Relieved by this little demonstration, the men of both tribes, it is said, feel much better, and live together in the most amicable relations—until the next occasion. Lord Shaftesbury's proposal to his rival Sheikh, Dr. Pusey, seems to partake of this venerable Arab philosophy. People of opposite opinions, he says, may act together for a good purpose, but then they ought not to act "in unison." Let my tribe and yours, the children of Low Church and High Church, stick their spears severally into our camel of reconciliation, Dr. Temple, from their respective sides; to thrust at him jointly would be a deviation from correct principle.

As we mentioned last week, if the Chapter delay to elect for twelve days after receiving the letter calling upon them to do so, the Sovereign may appoint at pleasure by letters patent under the Great Seal. We hardly think it will be found necessary to have recourse to such a step, but the threat, on the part of some, now is, that if Mr. Gladstone persists in his resolution to perpetrate this "horrible scandal," when disestablishment comes Dr. Temple will not be acknowledged as bishop, because not canonically elected! And, if we may take Archdeacon Denison at his word, when the heretical bishop enters on his see, we shall have the former, as an ally of the Liberation Society, advocating the separation of Church and State. Dr. Pusey, too, is evidently made to see more clearly even than before that he cannot have at once the advantages of a State Church and freedom and self-government, and his conclusion is, "viewing them steadily in the face, all the sufferings incidental to passing from a state of establishment to disestablishment, all the loss of that influence which the title of 'the Church of the nation' conveys, all the privations of the village poor in the transition, we have no choice but to long, at any cost, for a severance from the iron hand of the State." "Hitherto," remarks the Pall Mall, "it has been the great boast of the defenders of the State Church that it has gathered together with a wise liberality men of very wide divergences of opinion. Now it seems as if the bond, instead of keeping them in harmony, only made their mutual antipathies more furious. Dr. Pusey fairly raves against Dr. Temple, not because he has serious grounds for believing him to be a heretic, but because he thinks him deficient in proper zeal against the extreme liberal wing of the Establishment. Meanwhile, the Dean of Ripon holds the doctrines of both his brethren to be equally poisonous, and only condescends to say that one is covered with leprosy and the other leprous enough to be contagious without being openly offensive. The party which professes more liberal principles is by far the weakest in everything but ability. How are three such hostile forces to be retained within one camp? Are we not, in Dr. Pusey's words, merely observing one petty addition to 'the great tide which is already setting towards disestablishment?' If fifty years have been enough to bring out this hostility, what will be the state of the Church by the end of the century?"

DR. TEMPLE'S HERESIES.

As it is now ten years since "Essays and Reviews" appeared, and the work has fallen, for the world in general, into oblivion, the Pall Mall thinks it may not be undesirable to recall to the memory of those who have forgotten it what the share was that Dr. Temple had in that work, which is occasioning the present outcry against him.

The essay which he contributed to it was called "The Education of the World," and consisted of an eloquent, though perhaps rather fanciful, expansion of the analogy between the development of the world and of an individual. The human race, he said, might be considered as a colossal man, whose life reached from the creation to the day of judgment; generations were days in this man's life; the creeds and doctrines of successive ages his thoughts; the state of society his manners; and his education was precisely similar to ours. Thus in the earliest period the law acted the part of schoolmaster, and arbitrary rules were intermixed with moral precepts, because the intellect was not yet ripe for distinguishing the difference, whilst implicit obedience was the highest duty. Thus the Jewish nation was disciplined and specially impressed through its early training with two great lessons, the connection between which was eloquently explained—belief in the unity of God, and an acknowledgment of the special value of chastity. When the intellect had gradually refined, we reach the meeting point between the law and the gospel. Whilst the Hebrews had disciplined the human conscience, Rome had disciplined the will, Greece the reason and taste, and Asia the spiritual imagination. The world was thus ready for the teaching specially appropriate to adolescence, though never at any age losing its power—the teaching of example. This, therefore, was the time of our Lord's presence on earth, and there can never be another example in the same sense as that which affected our race in its youth, when its preceptors were at their liveliest, and when it had not yet stiffened into the more rigid forms of maturity. The early Church contrived to impress us rather by example than by giving definite precepts or logical definitions of creeds. And now, although we are still in need of discipline and example, we have to work out in practice the teaching thus imparted. Here our great need is precisely that which is met by the bible. Admirable reasons are, of course, given for proving that the bible gives us all that we want in the best possible form. Even if careful criticism reveals interpolations or occasional errors of fact, its value cannot be diminished. "The immediate work of the day is the study of the Bible. Other studies will act upon the progress of mankind by acting through and upon this," and Dr. Temple adds, apparently as an equivalent statement, that if science is to have any effect it must be by acting upon men's moral and religious convictions. Although "this study must be for the present and some future time the centre of all other studies," there is no other which will not affect it; and we must now think as men, "governed by principles, if governed at all, and cannot rely any longer on the impulses of youth or the instincts of childhood."

It would be easy to criticise this statement in various ways, and to complain of it as giving rather a limited view of human progress; but at least it is an eloquent statement of the view which makes all history centre round the Christian revelation as its main determining influence, and accepts the Bible as the one great exponent of the divine intentions towards man. When one reads such a speculation, and hears that its author is considered as a flagrant heretic, one can only think of Lord Macaulay's remark upon Robert Montgomery's "Satan"—namely, that he had always known that the Prince of Darkness was a gentleman, but that he was surprised to find him a highly respectable gentleman whose worst fault was a tendency to pious twaddle. It requires a theological microscope of extraordinary powers to discover the slightest latent approach to anything like heterodoxy in an essay which consists in great measure in working out some remarks of St. Paul, mixed with a certain quantity of very excellent moral and philosophical reflections. If it had been pronounced, as the substance of it was, as a sermon at Oxford, and flavoured with a few more texts in deference to the place, we are sure that the most respectable heads of houses and professors of divinity would have gone home without a doubt to check their appetite for luncheon.

We know, however, that this is not the real point of the charge. It was stated in the preface to "Essays and Reviews," that each author was responsible for his own essay only. They were written, it was added, in entire independence of each other, and without concert or comparison. The degree to which Dr. Temple can fairly be held responsible for the opinions of his colleagues is therefore a delicate question. It is perfectly obvious to any candid reader that nothing in his own essay could be laid hold of by the most ingenious of theologians as by itself objectionable. Nor is there even a presumption that he agreed in any particular opinion expressed in the other essays. It is said that, "though urged thereto by more than one bishop," he did not withdraw his essay nor disapprove the opinions of his co-essayists. But, inconceivable as is the obduracy which would resist more than one bishop, it would not be a generous action when his friends were undergoing trial in the law courts and by public opinion to express any disagreement if he felt it; it would necessarily imply that there was a certain "solidarity" which had been expressly disavowed, and that his other companions might fairly be put to the question. Any man of common spirit would naturally challenge his accusers to point out any faults they could find in his own writings, without attempting to saddle him with the opinions of his friends. To give way to such demands would certainly look like a desertion. All that can fairly be said is that he held, in the words of the preface, that a free handling of such subjects would be advantageous to the cause of moral and religious truth. This is the extent of his offending; the worst that can be said of him is that he sincerely held that such a book as "Essays and Reviews" was, on the whole, a beneficial stimulant to inquiry. No one will wonder that the ordinary clergyman should regard even this modified degree of approbation with intense disgust; though more sensible persons would not consider it to be sufficient justification for a revolt against the constitution of the State Church.

AMERICAN NOTES.

The Rev. J. F. Clarke says:

"When I preached in Milwaukee a few Sundays ago, it happened that three churches, of three different denominations, all sang the same hymn the same evening, 'Nearer, my God, to Thee, nearer to Thee.' That hymn was first published in America in our own hymn-book. It was taken by me from a little volume called 'Hymns and Anthems,' for which it was written by Mrs. Sarah F. Adams, to be sung in W. J. Fox's church, an extreme radical in opinion. Now, not an orthodox society in America but values that hymn as one of its very best. All this shows us the meaning of the phrase, 'Unity of the Spirit,' and indicates how easily the Christian Church may become one, when it finds its unity, not in opinion, but in a communion of spirit and life."

If we may believe some of the stories which we find in American journals, boys in the States, especially "out West," are "smarter" than our own. One of them, for instance, being lately asked if he knew where liars went to, replied, "Yes; they go to New York to write for the papers."

The Liberal Christian says:

"It is high time that the Protestant part of our population, and all friends of political and religious liberty, were awakened to the fact that the Roman Catholic faith and church are coming to be recognised and favoured by our civil authorities as the State religion and ecclesiasticism of New York. It is well known what the Legislature has done with reference to this matter. That ought to have been enough to arouse Protestants to a sense of their danger and duty. Now comes the recent action of the city government whereby a rebate of taxes and assessments to the amount of about $9,000 was granted to a Roman Catholic cathedral and orphan asylum, while a similar grant of five or six hundred dollars, in behalf of a struggling Presbyterian church, was ignominiously refused. This is only 'the beginning of the end,' unless Protestants lay aside their petty divisions and strifes, and prepare themselves aright to meet this new issue of the times. It is notorious that the overwhelming burden of the taxes and assessments by which our civil and educational institutions are maintained is borne by Protestants and not by Catholics. Yet it is by the latter that our city and State officers seem now to be elected, and elected for no purpose so much as to plunder the pockets and trample on the rights of the former."

Brigham Young says there are three preachers in America he wants to hear preach in his Tabernacle—Chapin, Collyer, and Beecher.

Dr. George B. Cheever thinks people are suffering for want of "Spiritual Ventilation." "We pack ourselves close," he says, "even our souls, for traffic—closer than slaves in the hold of a slave-ship. We shut down the hatchways, and forbid the air of heaven. Many of our occupations are so unlawful and explosive by the truth that we fend off its atmosphere, and carry safety-lamps against the possibility of some adverse current of it blowing on us. Its breezes and our sepulchral life, our life of masked balls at noon-day, cannot go on together. Some of our very theological systems, and forms of Christianity, so called, are contrived to keep this air of truth divine from having free course through human society and human souls."

Ward Beecher expresses himself thus strongly against a very common practice:

"There is a large class of deceptions which are pleaded and extenuated, such as telling lies to children and telling lies to sick persons. I set my face against the whole of this miserable tribe of wickedness. A lie told to a child is a monstrous thing. I abhor it. And yet lies are told to the children as thick as cloves are stuck in hams when dressed for a public occasion. Your child is sick, and you bring him a potion and say, 'It is good, my dear, it is good,' when it is bitter as gall. You are not only a liar, but a fool. The child learns after a little time not only that the medicine is not good, but that the truth is not to be regarded. You not only give the child an odious dose of medicine, but you give him a more odious dose of morals. You inculcate him with a spirit of lying from the beginning. I think we cannot be too careful to speak the truth, and above all to the children. As to the sick, I do not believe it necessary to tell them all the truth. A doctor is not justified in lying to his patient. It is easy for him to say to the person whose case he has undertaken, 'You must have confidence in me.' But if he says anything, let him say the truth. It may excite the patient, or may not; but if excitability is a reason for not telling the truth, then it is a reason for silence; it is not a reason for deception. I think that such persons are oftentimes injured by being deceived. I think there is a great deal of cruelty practised towards sick people in this way. And I think it is a shame to let sick people go blindfolded down to death, and drop off without a single word, for fear that they will be injured if the truth is told them. I think if a person is going to die he has a right to know it."

A church out West advertises for sale a pew which "commands a view of nearly the whole congregation."

In a sketch of the Protestant Episcopal Bench of the United States, the New York Herald informs us that it has 49 bishops. The Right Rev. B. B. Smith, D.D., of Kentucky, is the presiding bishop; the Right Rev. C. P. McIlvaine, D.D., LL.D., of Ohio, the next in seniority; and the Right Rev. F. D. Huntington, D.D., of Central New York, the last in the order of consecration. Bishop Tuttle, of Idaho and Utah, is the youngest in age, and Bishop Kemper, of Wisconsin, the oldest. Of the bishops 33 are High Church, 2 Broad, 14 Low. Of the "High," a dozen are more or less inclined to ritualism—not given to its excesses, but favourable to many of its forms and measures; daily prayer, free seats, surpliced choirs, choral services, weekly communion, frequent offertories, elaborate decorations, systematic charities. The others belong to the "High and Dry," who are noted for the tenacity with which they stick to the Prayer Book as it is. They are extremely conservative of old ways and notions; they repudiate all schemes of revision or reformation; they prefer Protestant to Catholic custom, and American to Sarum "use." They have no taste for aesthetics or ecclesiology, delight more in dogmas than dalmatics, creeds than chasubles, articles of religion than antependiums. The only two bishops at all worthy of the appellation "Broad" are Clark, of Rhode Island, and Davis, of South Carolina. Bishop Clark considers the glory of the American Church to consist in its catholicity. He would tolerate within its pale every phase of churchmanship, from ritualist to rationalist. Every taste and talent should therein find scope. Lovers of a high ceremonial or simple form should both have exercise. The old creeds, not modern articles of faith, should be the basis of union, and the motto, "In essentials unity, in non-essentials liberty, in all things charity," be the Church's watchword. Low Churchmen all belong to the invisible Church, believe in conversion and the Evangelical Knowledge Society, in high pulpits and honest tables, in all "unions" but those of Churchmen, in all evangelical churches and orthodox preachers, in vital religion and prayer meetings. They are fond of breaking canons and spiritualising rubrics. The Low Church prelates, however, are less radical than their flocks. They won't revise the Prayer Book till they themselves are revised. They will stick to Prayer Book "regeneration," if it requires whole sermons to explain the word. They will stick to the Episcopal office, if they don't "magnify" it. They will hold to the Church while it affords them pasture. The most distinguished of them, Bishop McIlvaine, has been conspicuous, not only "in the courts of the Lord's house," but in other courts. He is just now at war with his presbyter, Tate. The latter would worship toward the Lord's temple and would "enter into His gates with thanksgiving and into His courts with praise." The bishop doesn't agree with the Psalmist or Mr Tate. He dislikes processions and processional hymns. They evidently smack too much of the Prayer Book. Advanced and advancing Churchmen won't do for Ohio.

The New York Times of the 14th inst. mentions that 350 English Mormons had arrived at Omaha on the previous Monday on their way to Utah.

THE CONGREGATIONAL UNION.

THE autumn meeting of this powerful Union, held this year at Wolverhampton, commenced with a religious service on Monday evening, Oct. 18th, when about 1,200 persons were present. The sermon was preached by the Rev. R. A. REDFORD, of Hull. He took for his text Isa. xlii. 10, "Ye are My witnesses, saith the Lord," and showed that in all ages and amongst all nations of the earth God had provided Himself with witnesses of one kind and another, though it was only in Christ that the revelation had been made complete. After his ascension, the apostles were witnesses for him. They resigned their functions into the hands of the Church, and now the vocation of His people must be fulfilled by preaching the Word, by Christian fellowship, and by the development of Christian life in the heart of society. Under the first of these heads, he said the present time brings with it the question, What is the Bible in its relation to other books? and the witness must be prepared with an answer. The Bible is God's testimony concerning redemption. Those who preach the Word of God are not commanded to preach out of the Bible inspired science, or inspired history, or inspired philosophy; no, nor even, in the restricted sense of the words, inspired ethics. We are not derogating from the authority of Scripture if we refuse to preach it where it is not sent by God. Moses is not wanted to teach us astronomy or geology. A doctrine of inspiration which demands that the Scriptures shall be a kind of head authority in all departments of knowledge because they are the oracles of God, cannot comport with the facts of history and the progress of the world; and, therefore, instead of lending power to the voice of God's witnesses, shuts the ear of those whom they would win to the truth. To preach the Bible is to preach Christ, the personal Redeemer.

On Tuesday morning at least 700 ministers and delegates assembled in the body of the chief Congregational chapel, while the galleries were filled with visitors. The opening address was delivered by the President, the Rev. R. W. DALE, the successor to Angell James, at Birmingham. His subject was "The Holy Spirit in relation to the Ministry, the Worship, and the Work of the Church." In speaking on the first of these heads, after showing that in the Congregational theory of the ministry the direct action of the Holy Ghost was recognised, as much as in the Romish Church, and expressing his belief that all true and successful ministers are supernaturally qualified for their office, he said, while admitting to the full the necessity for a learned ministry, he contended also that ample room existed for the services of men endowed by divine gifts and graces who had not been to college, and rebuked those who would hinder any devout and holy man becoming a minister of the Gospel and a pastor of a church. He asked, "Must the Divine call never come to any one who is over four-and-twenty, and is too old to enter college? Are we to lay it down as an axiom that when a man has ceased to be 'a novice,' and when, by many years of devout and holy living, he has not only obtained 'a good report of them which are without,' but acquired a depth of spiritual knowledge, and a steadfastness of faith, and a wealth of human experience, hardly possible in early manhood, the spirit of God cannot be permitted to stir his heart to 'desire the office of a bishop,' and that, if he does desire it, the desire should be suppressed as presumptuous, irregular, and illegitimate? Colleges are intended for men who are capable of becoming scholars; can we venture to say that no man who does not show a capacity for mastering a Greek chorus or the intricacies of the Athanasian controversies can ever receive direct from heaven the supernatural gifts which constitute the qualification for the ministry?" After calling upon religious laymen to give help as preachers, more especially among the neglected poor, he strongly insisted on the need of men of intellectual vigour for other kinds of service, and pleaded for a far more liberal culture being given to the sons of merchants and wealthy tradesmen of their body, in order that young men of this class might be better fitted for service in the church. He said, "If we desire to have a learned ministry, and yet believe that no man should be a minister who has not received a Divine commission, the only reasonable course seems to be to induce a far larger number of educated Christian youths to consecrate the years of early manhood to theological studies, and then to implore God to grant them that inspiration of the Holy Ghost without which no intellectual discipline, no wealth of theological learning, can fit them for ministerial service. Our present methods, though the best available in our actual circumstances, are artificial. We shall never have a really learned ministry until we have a more learned church." Then addressing himself to the subject of the Holy Spirit in relation to the worship and work of the Church, Mr. Dale said that the spirit of prayer must come from the Holy Ghost, as well as the spirit of thanksgiving and worship, and that "when we pray, our great design is not to move men, but to move God, and if we fail to do that, we fail altogether;" and while pressing upon all the members of their churches the obligation to take part in the conversion of the world, he maintained that it was not from a sense of responsibility that this evangelistic work would ever be successfully done, but from an ardent love of men, and a deep compassion for their sin and misery.

Our notice of the other proceedings must be very brief.

Mr. CARVELL WILLIAMS moved resolutions, which were passed with only a single dissentient, expressing the thankfulness of the Assembly that justice had at length been done to the Irish people by the Act of last Session, and tendering sympathy and help to the Episcopalians of Ireland under the new circumstances in which they are placed. We are afraid that Irish Churchmen have hardly yet settled into the frame of mind needed for a proper appreciation of such a message of sympathy from their non-established brethren.

On the motion of the Rev. T. BINNEY, seconded by Mr. S. MORLEY, M.P., a resolution was carried, commending the British missions to the support and confidence of the ministers and churches, and recommending an annual collection in their behalf.

A resolution was also passed instructing the committee of the Union "to prepare in a form, suitable for general circulation, a well-considered statement of our views on the question of Church and State, and of the grounds of our objection and opposition to their union, showing how foreign that union is to the genius of Christianity, as well as unsupported by Scripture, and how, in various ways, it interferes with the general government of the nation, inflicts injury on its social life, impedes the progress of education, and raises up obstacles on all sides to the spread of Christian faith and morals."

On Wednesday, the Rev. J. C. GALLOWAY read a paper upon the subject of a proposed Chapel Insurance Society. He stated that with respect to 1,297 buildings, about which returns had been obtained, it was found that they were valued at £3,108,000. Only 24 fires had been reported in their history, for which £5,000 had been received, while the premiums paid were £50,000 at least. Guarantees had been received to the amount of £7,000. Mr. Galloway suggested that by insuring their property themselves the Congregational body would save a considerable amount, which might be applied to denominational purposes. The matter was referred to the Union Committee.

A report was read from a special committee on a plan for establishing a ministerial sustentation fund, which should secure a respectable income to every minister.—The subject was referred to the Committee, with instructions to obtain information, with the view of holding a conference when the subject was ripe for consideration.

Addresses were also delivered on the Evangelical Continental Society, on chapel building societies, and on a pastor's retiring fund. In relation to the last, Mr. MORLEY said he would give £1,000 to the fund, if £19,000 were raised within twelve months.

On Thursday, the PRESIDENT, in reference to a suggestion of Dr. Merle D'Aubigné for a general Protestant Council in opposition to that which the Pope has summoned at Rome, said: "I do earnestly trust we shall in our congregations not pray against the Roman Church, but pray on behalf of the Roman Church. The Council will first meet, as you are aware, on the 8th of December, the anniversary of the definition by the Pope of the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception; and from that time I trust we shall all of us feel it to be a special duty to entreat God to grant to that Church what He did grant to many of its illustrious members in centuries gone by—the teaching of His own good Spirit. Let us not forget that what of Christian light there was in Europe for many ages was revealed mostly in connection with that communion, and that the grace bestowed on Rome in days gone by may be bestowed again in our own days. And let us rather hope that the great reformation we desire to see accomplished in that Church may be the result of a development of a deeper and richer and more vigorous life in itself, than the result of attacks made on that Church from without. God may use the agency of the Protestant communions in order to give light and freedom to the members of the Roman communion. Let us do our own part, so far as we can, towards the emancipation of our brethren in that Church from the errors and thralldom under which they have been held so long; but let us, above all things, entreat God, by the Spirit of Truth, to lead the Roman Church into all truth."

On Friday the members discussed the Birmingham secular education scheme, but without coming to a definite resolution upon it. The PRESIDENT strongly protested against denominational education. Mr. BINNEY was more guarded in his observations. He doubted whether much good usually came from the religious instruction given in day schools, but he was in favour of reading the Bible, even the Old Testament portions of which (such as the Psalms and the Prophets) might be read as Hebrew classics with more benefit to the children than they could gain from Homer.

The next meeting of the Union is to be held at Plymouth.

FIRESIDE READINGS.

SABBATH BELLS.

LOUDLY ringing Sabbath Bells!
Glad sounds on my ear they fall,
And my willing, eager footsteps
Joyful answer to the call,
While my heart rings back their gladness,
Strangely intermixed with sadness.

In the cool and silent chapel,
Now I bend my knees, and pray:
"Father! bless me with thy presence,
Make me all thine own to-day;"
And sweetly on my troubled breast
Descends a calm and heavenly rest.

Holy stillness for a season;
Then upon the summer wind,
Yet a few faint echoes linger,
Loth to leave the world behind,
Falling on each saddened feeling,
Like to balmy drops of healing.

Now the organ softly swelling,
Welcomes in a calm pale face;
Eyes of silent adoration,
Lips that utter words of grace—
Words that fall like dews from heaven,
Telling earth of sin forgiven.

"Father! keep me in this hour,
Merge my every wish in one,
Content to live, content to die,
So Thou leave me not alone;
Past the reach of sin, O, take me!
All that Thou would'st have me, make me." R. F.

CHURCH CURIOSITIES.—XXIII.

HOW TO QUIET A NOISY MAN.

At the late meeting of Presbytery in America, when the subject of Scripture was under discussion, Brother Watson said that early in his ministry he and another preacher were conducting a meeting in which there was much religious interest. An old man gave expression to his joy by shouting, and continued it until it began to interrupt the services. Brother Hall said to brother Watson, "Go, stop that old man's noise." He went to him and spoke a few words, and the shouting at once ceased. Brother Hall asked brother Watson, "What did you say to the old man that quieted him so promptly?" Brother Watson replied, "I asked him for a dollar for foreign missions."

BISHOPS' GATE.

It has often been said, by way of jest, that the living of "Bishopsgate" has proved a gate to a bishopric. The fact was visibly shown one Sunday in 1834, when three sermons were preached in Bishopsgate Church by three former vicars, Dr. Mant, Bishop of Down and Connor, Dr. Blomfield, Bishop of London, and Dr. Grey, Bishop of Hereford.

NO IMPROVED VERSION ALLOWED.

When Dr. Phillpotts became a bishop he also, as is well known, became a very High Churchman, compelled his clergy to preach in their surplices, and would not brook the most trivial departure from the liturgical letter. One Sunday, at Torquay, he sat with the worshipping congregation in a church where the Rev. E. Elliott officiated. That clergyman, in reading the Communion Service, ventured to soften the phrase "eat and drink their own damnation." He read it "condemnation," when a voice was heard to exclaim "damnation!" startling all ears in the church. It was the voice of their bishop, who would have the forcible, undiluted word.

A LITTLE OUT.

A short time ago, an old lady, more noted for piety than learning, left her native Highlands for a visit to Edinburgh. While there, she was taken to see the various public places of interest, and among the rest Holyrood Palace and the Chapel Royal. After having shown her and her friends some of the resting-places of the Scottish kings, the guide at length stopped short at a particular tomb, "And this is the tomb of King David;" on hearing which announcement the good old woman became greatly excited, and clasping her hands and casting her eyes heavenwards, gasped out in wondering accents, "Eh, sir, d'ye tell me so? Eh, did I ever think my auld een would see sic a glorious sight! An' whar is Saul's tomb, an whar does Solomon, the glory of Judah an' Israel, rest? Have ye not got their banes here, too?"

WELSH ENGLISH.

The following note was recently addressed, by a candidate for the post of chapel-keeper, to the deacons of a Welsh chapel:—"Sir and Gentlemen of Committee of Ros Place Chapel,—I was here from a member that your gude father public that there was want a Capel Ceper for new Braspterraine Capel in Clarence Street, and I offers myself for plase. I was not be member but was have it in my mind to offer myself and it was get Capel I comes a member quick sticks. I was not mared but was have a woman who is member in my mind's eye to marry 'er. I certifie that I will kape the Capel awful clane—My professun is labor and I was work sometimes for Mr. Jones, Adle-street. Plase let us no as soon as you can as I was like to by fernish for new hose. I was sit under gallary in Rose Plase, and I was be 29 ears in my life. I remene, Gentlemans, your umble servan ———."

A PULPIT HUMORIST.

There are not many of the old style of sensational preachers left in the Wesleyan Connexion, but the Rev. Peter Mackenzie, sometimes called the "black diamond," is one, as a few examples of his style will show. Upon one occasion, speaking of the dying thief on the cross, he said, "He took a first-class ticket and went to heaven express; passing through stations and tunnels without stopping until he arrived in glory." On another occasion, taking Paradise for his subject, he said, "The hedge of it was so tall that the devil could not get over it, so thick that he could not shoot through it, and so well secured at the bottom that the littlest dog in hell could not creep under." He once described Methodism as "a cheap religion—only a penny a week and a shilling per quarter, with a few anniversaries as extras." He dealt with Ritualism thus—"Some try to make an improvement upon the white horse by fitting it with worn-out tapestry." Commenting upon the desire of some Wesleyans to join the Establishment, he said, "Methodism is going over to the Church as fast as the hound goes after the hare, and the Church is going to Popery as fast as legs can carry it, and Popery is going to the naughty place even faster."

A RESULT OF BIBLE TEACHING.

The Rev. F. C. Routledge, Inspector of Schools, in a report to the Committee of Council on Education, gives the following "exact copy" of a Life of David, written, he states, by "an otherwise shrewd and clever boy:" "David was the son of Saul, and when he was yet quite young he could play upon the harp; when his father was in trouble he used to send for his son. But above when Belshazzar were having a large feast they were an hand upon the wall, and Belshazzar were afraid, but he called for his physicians together, so has he would get to know what the handwriting was? But they could not tell him, so then he said he would give any man a new suit of clothes that could tell him. So then he sent for David and David told him."

THE LOST CHILD.

THE following touching narrative occurs in Hawthorne's "Diary," which was published a short time since:—"As we drove home, E— told a story of a child who was lost, seventy or eighty years ago, among the woods and hills. He was about five years old, and had gone with some workpeople to a clearing in the forest, where there was a ryefield, at a considerable distance from the farmhouse. Getting tired he started for home alone, but did not arrive. They made what search for him they could that night, and the next day the whole town was turned out, but without success. The day following, many people from the neighbouring towns took up the search, and on this day, I believe, they found the child's shoes and stockings, but nothing else. After a while they gave up the search in despair; but for a long time, a fortnight or three weeks or more, his mother fancied that she heard the boy's voice in the night, "Father, father!" One of his little sisters also heard this voice; but people supposed that the sounds must be those of some wild animal. No more search was made, and the boy never was found.

But, it is not known whether it was the next autumn, or a year or two after, some hunters came upon traces of the child's wanderings among the hills, in a different direction from the previous search, and farther than it was supposed he could have gone. They found some little houses such as children build of twigs and sticks of wood, and these the little fellow had probably built for amusement in his lonesome hours. Nothing, it seems to me, was more strangely touching than this incident,—his finding time for childish play, while wandering to his death in these desolate woods,—and then pursuing his way again, till at last he lay down to die on the dark mountain side. Finally, on a hill which E— pointed out to me, they found a portion of the child's hair adhering to the overthrown trunk of a tree; and this was all that was ever found of him. But it was supposed that the child had subsisted, perhaps for weeks, on the berries and other sustenance such as a forest child knew how to find in the woods. I forgot to say, above, that a piece of birch or other bark was found, which he appeared to have gnawed. It was thought that the cry of "Father, father!" which the mother and little sister heard in the night time, was really the little fellow's voice, then within hearing of his home, but he wandered away again, and at last sank down, and death found him and carried him up to God. His bones were never found; and it was thought that the foxes, or other wild animals, had taken his little corpse and scattered the bones, and that dragging the body along, one lock of his flaxen hair had adhered to a tree.

I asked a physician whether it were possible that a child could live so long in the woods; and he thought it was, and he said children often show themselves more tenacious of life than grown people, and live longer in a famine. This is to me a very affecting story; and it seems to be felt as such by the people of the country. The little boy's parents and his brothers and sisters, who probably lived to maturity or old age, are all forgotten; but he lives in tradition, and still causes wet eyes to strangers, perhaps, as he did to me.

To account for the singularity of his not having been found by such numbers as took up the search, it is suggested that he was perhaps frightened and concealed himself when he heard the noise of people making their way through the forest, people being apt to do so when they get mazed with wandering in the woods. But it is strange that old hunters, with dogs, should have failed to find him. However, there is the fact.

INTELLIGENCE.

MINISTERIAL APPOINTMENTS.—The Rev. W. S. Smith, minister of the Unitarian chapel, Doncaster, has accepted an invitation to take charge of the Tavistock congregation. Mr. Smith's uniform courtesy and gentlemanly conduct are universally acknowledged, and his friends have received the announcement of his removal with expressions of regret.—The Rev. Wm. Bargrave, B.A., of Newport, Isle of Wight, has accepted the invitation of the congregation of Oakfield-road Church, Clifton, to become their minister, and will enter upon his duties early in January.—The Rev. Noah Green, of Longton, has accepted an invitation from the congregation at Mottram to become their minister, and will enter upon his new duties at Christmas.

BURY: DISTRICT SUNDAY-SCHOOL UNION.—A meeting of the schools forming this association was held at Stand, on Sunday last,—about 120 teachers and scholars present. After tea, the Rev. W. C. Squier presided, and Mr. William Freeston delivered an address on "Some neglected subjects of Sunday-school education." A discussion followed, in which Messrs. Darbyshire (Stand), Holt (Bury), John Holt (Stand), R. Diggle (Heap Bridge), Lord (Bury), and Jones (Lower Mosley-street) took part. The general opinion of the speakers seemed to be in favour of teaching the doctrines of Unitarianism to elder scholars, and of conveying religion by means of the study of the lives of apostles and preachers of Christianity. Though Mr. Freeston's address provoked no opposition, valuable suggestions were thrown out by the different speakers. The meeting closed with singing and prayer.

LONDON: BAYSWATER.—Mr. A. J. Ellis, B.A., F.R.S., is now delivering lectures on the relations of Religion and Modern Thought, at the Free Church, in Linden grove.

LONDON: UNITARIAN LAY PREACHING UNION.—At the monthly meeting of the preachers, held at Stamford-street Chapel, on Monday last, Samuel Sharpe, Esq., after a brief religious service, delivered an address on the Book of Revelation. After the address Mr. Sharpe presided at the business meeting, which dealt with the reports from the several stations, many of which at the present time report considerable activity and some success. The importance of doing something at Chelsea was pointed out, and the desirableness of the friends of this Unitarian movement forming another Union in the north of London. The secretary of the Book Club, Dr. Dixon, sold the books to the members present, and promised at the next meeting there would be a parcel of recent theological works for adoption by the subscribers.

PERTH.—Considerable difficulty has been experienced in Perth in obtaining the use of halls. The local committee secured, as they thought, a hall for four weeks, and invited Mr. Williamson from Dundee to resume his lectures. Accordingly he visited the town on the 12th inst., but learned that external pressure had been brought to bear on the person letting the hall, which made him anxious to break the engagement. This makes the third time such treatment has been experienced here. Fortunately there is a good local committee who will use every means to secure a place in which the inhabitants of Perth may hear something of Unitarian Christianity.

SOUTHAMPTON.—A performance of sacred music, selected from Haydn's oratorio, the "Creation," and Handel's "Messiah," took place at the Church of the Saviour on Tuesday evening last, the object being the liquidation of the expenses incurred in the alteration and repairs of the organ. We are glad to learn that this purpose was fully attained. The sum raised, with the separate private subscriptions, amounted to £27. 10s. The chapel was completely filled on the occasion.

SOUTHPORT.—On Sunday last two sermons were preached by the Rev. William Gaskell, M.A., in aid of the building fund of the Portland-street Church, when the collections amounted to £52. 1s. 2d. This, with a donation of £5 received the same day, reduces the debt to £265. The congregation have done all that can reasonably be expected of them to complete their beautiful place of worship, and we feel no hesitation in calling upon our friends to help in relieving them from the remaining encumbrance, which must to some extent interfere with their efforts.

STOCKPORT.—The annual congregational soirée was held in the schoolroom, on Wednesday evening week. Nearly 250 persons were present. The room was most tastefully decorated with evergreens and the choicest flowers. The opening address was delivered by the Rev. James Black. A few remarks were subsequently made by the Rev. W. H. Herford and Major Coppock. The choir during the evening contributed much to the company's enjoyment.

STRATFORD, ESSEX.—The first social tea meeting was held in the new chapel, on Wednesday, October 20th, and the following took part in the proceedings of the evening: The Revs. R. Spears, J. Phillips, J. Cooper, and T. Rix; also Messrs. S. S. Tayler, W. N. Green, and J. Warne. Letters expressive of sympathy were received from the Revs. P. W. Clayden, H. Ierson, and J. C. Means, who were unable to attend the meeting. Mr. Rix announced that Mr. G. Hosking had offered to preside at an harmonium for six months gratuitously if one could be bought. A number of persons promised subscriptions for this object.

STROUD.—On Tuesday evening week, the Rev. H. Austin, of Cirencester, delivered his third lecture in the Corn Hall. The subject announced was "Eternal Punishment—not a doctrine of Christianity." The dogma was treated philosophically and Scripturally, and shown to be opposed not only to the truest and holiest instincts of man's spiritual nature but also, that it had no real foundation in Holy Scripture. Some feeling was stirred in the meeting, which resulted in a little discussion at the close.

CORRESPONDENCE.

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

No anonymous letters inserted: the writer of every letter must append his name for publication.

All letters, articles of intelligence, &c., should be addressed to the Unitarian Herald Office, 74, Market-street, and not to the private addresses of the Editors.

A. C.—We cannot admit that our quotation of such a paragraph as an item of "What is Saying," involves a correspondence on the subject, and therefore we must decline your letter.

J. W.—Received.

"Words from a Layman's Ministry."—We have received several letters asking about the likelihood of a second edition being issued, the first having been exhausted in a few weeks after publication, and no copies being now to be had. We are glad to call attention to an advertisement on the subject on our first page. Any friends who wish to promote the reprinting of the work can do so most effectually by sending their names, and the number of copies they would take, at once to Mr. Joseph Lee, of Barnard Castle.

BRITISH AND FOREIGN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.—INDIAN MISSION.

To the Editors.—The committee have deferred until now to call upon the subscribers to this mission for the sums so kindly promised, as they were not prepared to send out a European missionary whose salary would be less than £400 per annum. But now, as they see their way clear to some useful Christian work in that great empire of two hundred millions of souls, they hope the friends of this mission will aid them. Two native missionaries are engaged by the committee, the Revs. William Roberts and David Chonsimoothoo, and at the close of this year Mr. Roberts will probably be authorised to engage another native missionary. The committee have also made large grants (upwards of 500 volumes) of our best and most valuable books to Calcutta, Bombay, and Madras, and are in correspondence with some of the leaders of the religious reform movement in India, and Parsee gentlemen in London, interested in the diffusion of our literature among the educated Hindoos, as our Unitarian and religious literature is highly prized by them. These books will be circulated among hundreds of families who are conversant with our language. The committee hope that the misrepresentations, by some English writers, of these reformers will not be credited. The charges against Keshub Chunder Sen, that he imposes the worship of himself, is utterly false, and aims to damage this movement, because it repudiates the ordinary Trinitarian doctrines. In a letter we have by us from that distinguished and eloquent leader, he says, "The absurd paragraph you allude to has created some sensation here. It involves a charge beneath my notice. How can I, sinner as I am, and myself in need of salvation, undertake to be a redeemer unto others? All that I have done, and still do, is humbly to pray for the salvation of my friends and countrymen. If any of my countrymen stand in need of the help of a prophet, will they not naturally run to Jesus? Why will they stultify themselves by resorting to a sinner like myself?"—In a letter to us, from another of the most prominent men in this movement, he says, "We hold our meetings once a week, at which hymns are sung and prayers are made to the Great One, and good moral discourses are read. We conduct our service in our own language, that the uneducated people may understand. Our religious belief seems exactly such as you hold. The books you will be kind enough to send will be most thankfully received by us."

Here is now in India a door of Christian usefulness open to us, and we pray our people not to allow the opportunity to pass unemployed.

R. SPEARS, Secretary.

A SKETCH OF THE CHARACTER OF

JESUS: A Biblical Essay. By Dr. D. SCHENKEL, Professor of Theology in the University of Heidelberg, and Kirchenrath in the Grand Duchy of Baden. Translated from the Third German Edition.

"This is a book of no small importance."—London Quarterly Review.

"Those who aspire to lead thought in the Church will do well to peruse this book, for it contains much that is important and interesting, and is written in a very genuine style, and is evidently the result of much careful research and reflection."—English Churchman.

Professor Schenkel endeavours to serve the cause of evangelical truth by setting forth what is noble and great in the life and teaching of the Saviour, holding him up as the Light of the World. His book is therefore constructive. The spirit and tone in which he writes is calm and even reverential, diametrically opposed to the icy coldness of Strauss."—Athenaeum.

"These are in this work passages of great power and beauty."—British Quarterly Review.

"In an appendix are added some critical and historical illustrations which are well worthy the attention of the English reader."—Westminster Review.

ON THEIR OWN MERITS,

THE WINES OF HUNGARY are good, useful, Wines, without FORCING upon them, as has been too much the case, a reputation and character beyond their INTRINSIC QUALITIES. There is sufficient diversity of taste in a large population to ensure for the Wines a fair trial and a regular market; and it is fairer to place them well before the public, and let them stand the test of comparison with those of other countries. In the long run this will be best for the interests of the Wines themselves, as they are really good, sound Wines. Perhaps the quality most in demand, and much recommended by doctors, is

CARLOWITZ,

WHICH WE OFFER AT 22s. PER DOZEN, and ask comparison with the HIGHEST PRICED quality of LONDON HOUSES. We may remark that we were among the VERY FIRST who brought Wines from Hungary seven years ago.

WHAT THE CHURCHES ARE DOING.

The Rev. C. H. A. Dall, after ten days' missionary labour in Bombay, left for Calcutta on the 8th of October.

The cause of religious liberty is making progress all the world over. The Spanish Government has decreed that in Cuba and Porto Rico no one shall be prevented from holding office on account of his religious belief, but all denominations be placed on a footing of equality.—In Australia, too, the days of State aid to religion are numbered. Protestants of every denomination, Catholics and Jews, received a share of the grant of £50,000 a year set apart for religious purposes by the Constitution Act, but resolutions, proposed by the Chief Secretary, have been carried unanimously, and a bill founded upon them, that the grant shall be reduced £10,000 a year, so that at the end of five years it should entirely cease.

The Pope seems to be almost rejuvenescent at the anticipation of his approaching Council, and smokes his cigar, it is said, with unusual vigour. The other day a German priest brought him an address and a considerable sum of money from the ladies of a German diocese, and in accepting the gift his Holiness inquired whether the bishop was coming to the Council. The priest replied that he was too old, being in his seventy-first year. "You call seventy-one old?" exclaimed the Pope. "I am seventy-eight, and I feel young, and shall assist at the Council without neglecting my other duties." The week before last, he walked all the way to the tobacco manufactory in the Trastevere, and was presented by the manager with several thousands of the best cigars. Being told that a great part of the work was done by the girls of the Trastevere, who are more celebrated for their good looks than good character, he exclaimed, "Conduct me, then, to these servants of God." What a splendid text is here for Dean Close's next anti-tobacco blast! We respectfully call his attention to it.

The first stone has been laid of the monument commemorative of the "Council of the Vatican," to be erected in front of the church of San Pietro in Montorio, on the Janiculum. Cardinal Berardi, who was robed in pontificals, placed under the stone the usual deposit of coins and a plate bearing this inscription: "An. MDCCCLXIX. Tridie Idus Octobrij. Ego Joseph tituli SS. Marcellini et Petri, S.R.E. Presbyter Cardinalij Berardi, de mandato SSmi. Dni. Nostri Pii Papæ IX. hunc lapidem auspicalem benedixi memorie columnæ B. Petro Apostolorum Principi dicatæ erigendæ in memoriam Concilii Œcumenici pro die octava Decembrij ejusdem anni indicti."

The hearing of the charge of heresy against the Rev. Charles Voysey, vicar of Healaugh, is to be commenced on the 1st of next month, at York Minster, before the Worshipful G. H. Vernon, judge of the Consistory Court of the diocese.

It is encouraging to find that, in spite of the denunciations of Cardinal Cullen and his priests, the attachment of the Roman Catholic laity and youth to the Queen's Colleges remains unabated. At the annual meeting of the Queen's University, when the Lord-Lieutenant presided, the report presented showed that of 740 students in the colleges during the past year nearly a third had been Presbyterians, a slightly smaller number Episcopalians, about an eighth were from other Protestant denominations, but nearly a fourth had been Roman Catholics. It is a fact, too, worthy of notice that notwithstanding the cardinal's threat to withhold the sacrament from parents who sent their children to the model schools, there are at present 1,000 Roman Catholic children in attendance at the schools in Marlborough-street, Dublin.

Preparations are being made for the meeting of the General Synod of the Irish Episcopal Church. Notice was given in the parish churches on Sunday that after an interval of five days lay representatives will be chosen in the proportion of, at most, two for every officiating clergyman, the voters being all male adult members of the congregations. The persons so chosen will be returned, in the first instance, as to diocesan synods, from which delegates will be selected for the "General Synod." The Bishop of Ossory has stated that the bishops and clergy will probably accept, but not unanimously, the principle of "voting by orders," and the double representation of laymen. Like the Archbishop of Dublin, he condemns the raising of controversies on the formularies of the Church, as certain to lead to confusion and weakness, if not to schism.

Upwards of £10,000 is being expended in restoring the parish church of Berkhamstead, interesting for its associations with the poet Cowper, whose father was the incumbent of that parish. It was from the rectory there that the gardener Robin "wheeled the sickly child to school along the public way," as described in Cowper's beautiful lines, "On receipt of my mother's picture." The rector and his wife are both buried in the church, the latter within the communion rails, where the touching inscription to "Mrs. Cowper, who died in the 34th year of her age," and to her six children, who "all died infants," is now entirely hidden from sight by a dusty carpeting. A contemporary remarks that "it is curious that while money is thus found in such abundance for restoring a parish church, the neighbouring abbey of St. Albans, the most venerable, and in some respects the most interesting ecclesiastical building in England, remains almost entirely neglected—doomed, like its once richly-endowed school, to constant but not inglorious poverty and decay. Perhaps if St. Albans, as has been suggested, should be made the seat of a bishopric, some of the old prosperity of the abbey may yet return."

It was expected that the congé d'élire for the election of a bishop of Exeter would reach the dean and chapter yesterday, and the election in that case will most likely take place to-morrow, Saturday being the usual day for the meetings of the chapter.

WHAT IS SAYING ON CHURCH MATTERS.

The Pall Mall hears from Rome that at the approaching Council red, blue, and white balls will be employed to represent the votes in the following manner: The red will be affirmative; the blue, negative; the white will express doubt or dissent, hesitation or scepticism. If the Fathers of the Council are to be thoroughly sincere, it is likely they will principally make use of the white balls.

It is reported that one matter brought before the Council will be a proposition of the Emperor Napoleon respecting the composition of the Sacred College. He complains that Italy, with only 24,000,000 inhabitants, is allotted thirty-six cardinals, while 35,000,000 obtain for France only five or six, and he demands that the dignity shall be distributed in the ratio of the population. The rule is to extend to Austria, Spain, Portugal, and other Catholic nations.

The Rev. J. Crompton, of Norwich, "a Dissenter against his will," who a short time since stated in the Guardian his objections to the imprecations of the Athanasian Creed, in replying to several notices which these had called forth, says:

"As to the question whether the Athanasian Creed damns the whole Eastern Church, as asserted by the Dean of Westminster, but controverted by Mr. M. W. Mayow, I leave the dean to answer for himself, only declaring on my part that I agree with him, and think Mr. M. W. Mayow adds one more specimen to my steadily increasing collection of the special pleadings to which men resort, in all unconsciousness, when some favourite point is to be maintained. I fear, had he lived in the times of the struggles of the Churches, his acute distinction of leaving out the 'filioque' and not denying the doctrine would not have saved him from the prison or the stake, by which both sides of the controversy, in those earnest days, were accustomed to prove at once their charity to the souls of doubters, heretics, or scrupulous believers, and their sincerity of belief in their own shape of the formula."

In answer to one whose experience of the way in which the creed was treated by the clergy was "singularly different" from his own, he says:

"I cannot find one in ten who has not some mode of evading and explaining it away, or some practice of escaping reading it. The fact that I was requested to print and circulate my 'Letter to the Bishops' by a society of clergy, formed under the express auspices of the late Bishop of Lichfield, surely speaks one volume at least, and that a thick one, in my favour."

And he assures some who had expressed their sense of the value of the creed in guarding against mysticism on the one hand and rationalism on the other, that—

"They would be astounded at the amount of Sabellianism, Arianism, and utter indifference to a negation of the doctrines, as explained and enforced in that creed, that would be revealed, were the clergy generally or even learned men of the Church well tested; as, for instance, if it were now freshly enacted and now for the first time demanded to be subscribed, and if the clergy were required to explain their views in terms of their own, not copied from the regular scholastic sources or the phrases of the Liturgy and Articles. That is an experiment I have frequently tried with very curious results."

Dean Boyd, addressing on Friday a Bible Society meeting at Exeter, observed that the stones of the earth were made to bear a certain testimony which was esteemed of greater value than that of the word of God. For example, he was reading the other day a popular lecture delivered at a mechanics' institution, in which it was stated that the Bible should not be credited because it was not consistent with facts. Among those facts it was said to be impossible that the human race could be descended from one pair, because of the curious physiological distinctions in the members of the human family. The story of the Garden of Eden was questioned, proof as to the existence of the rivers mentioned in the Bible was challenged, and the idea of a universal deluge was altogether scouted by men of scientific investigation. In reply to this the dean said that never were a number of statements so characterised by downright ignorance, and then proceeded to display his own. It was forgotten, he said, that a fresh start had been given to the human family, which began, not with Adam and Eve, but with the three sons of Noah—Shem, Ham, and Japheth. These three sets of progenitors accounted for the different races of men! As for the rivers running through the Garden of Eden, the deluge altered the physical features of the country; no wonder then that the rivers were washed out of existence. The dean mentioned a "triumph" of geologists in Derbyshire. The bed of a river was lowered ten feet, and under the very bottom were discovered fossils contradicting the chronology of the Bible. There was a great cry amongst the geologists that they had discovered something. The philosophers discovered unfortunately, however, amongst the fossils a coin of the reign of Edward III.

Some of the more rabid Evangelicals are making it too evident that no inconsiderable element in their opposition to Dr. Temple's appointment is a feeling that their party in the Church has not had its full share in the good things going. Thus, in what the Record calls an "admirable address" to the Working Men's Association at Doncaster, Mr. Robert Baxter, after mentioning that those whom Mr. Gladstone had appointed to the Episcopal bench were "either of the High Church party or Liberal Latitudinarians," went on to say:

"It is well known that the man who holds the reins of power in this realm is at the same time a High Churchman and also a man who has written in recommendation of 'Ecce Homo'—a work in which everything is made to depend upon this, that there needed no miracles, that our Lord needed to be nothing more than a man, to accomplish what he did accomplish. He was thus leaning towards Romanism on the one hand, and repudiating all Scriptural miracles or Divine doctrines on the other—a strange Liberalism, in the highest degree unsound and mischievous when acted upon in the appointment of bishops."

In a sermon last Sunday but one in praise of "devotion" to the Virgin Mary, Dr. Manning said that "in France and other Catholic countries that devotion was practised extensively and with good results in religion, while in England, Germany, and other Protestant countries, where devotion to the blessed Virgin was not cultivated, but was rejected, there had grown up Rationalism and Infidelity." We were not previously aware that France was exactly the country to be singled out for its freedom from infidelity.

The Bishop of Ely, in his visitation charge last week, undertook the defence of national Church establishments. He said that the Irish Church was doubtless the weakest outpost of a great fortress, and so might have been hard to defend; but it had fallen, and the force which laid it prostrate was advancing. A new principle had been enunciated, and the theory of Church and State had been rudely shaken. "Church-rates are gone, the marriage law is changed, there is a design to secularise all education; there is a threat of immediate attack on the Welsh Church, and the seats of the bishops in the House of Peers. The same influences are at work in Continental Christendom, the Church and the civil power being often at open war. All seems to indicate that we are entering on a new era, passing, perhaps, as much into a new atmosphere as those who lived in the times of Constantine, of Charlemagne, or Hildebrand, or the Reformation."

In Mr. Dale's address to the Congregational Union, he laid it down that "the direct and supernatural action of the Holy Spirit" is involved in the call to the ministry; that "the qualifications for it are also supernatural;" that "a supernatural power of 'exhortation' is necessary; that "every true minister of Christ must have received a Divine call, revelations of Divine truth, not necessary to his own personal consolation and sanctity, a supernatural faculty for speaking to the nobler powers of the human soul, and spiritual affections and sympathies of a special order, originated and sustained by the special inspiration of the Holy Ghost." On which the Christian World remarks:

"A High Churchman or a Roman Catholic might add to this that the supernatural power referred to is communicated to certain persons by laying on of hands; but no High Churchman, no Roman Catholic could claim more for the priesthood. Mr. Dale affirms that the true minister has undergone the action of a supernatural power additional to that exerted upon every man who is united by faith to Christ. He specifies Wilberforce, whose conversion he would not dispute, as not having the supernatural call to the ministry, and Whitfield as having it. He holds, indeed, that the supernatural called minister may be a tradesman, a labourer, a landed proprietor, and may continue his vocation while filling, in the full sense, the office of a bishop. But this does not affect the supernatural and mystic character which he assigns to the episcopal office. . . . Mr. Dale seems to us to mix up confusedly the supernatural inspiration of Scripture, the converting influence of the Spirit of God on the heart of every believer, and a third inspiration, that of those called to be ministers, to which, as additional to the others, we decline to give the title of supernatural at all."

Two writers in the Guardian take serious exceptions to some parts of the paper on "Modern Phases of Unbelief," which Mr. Richard Hutton read at the late Church Congress. One of them, while admitting its ability, "fears the thoughts expressed will do great mischief and spread as a subtle spiritual poison." He specially calls attention "to one point, which is the leading feature of the whole," and that is the idea that there can be such a thing as "conscientious truth-seeking scepticism." This, he says, "is an impossibility, and involves even a contradiction in terms. 'Conscientious truth-seeking' is absolutely incompatible with the habit of mind which is described as scepticism. We might as well be told of 'pious faithful infidelity.'" And the other objector, the Archdeacon of Clogher, entirely denies Mr. Hutton's statement, that "the historical detail . . . taken alone, would have been insufficient to have proved the existence of the physically supernatural, had it not been proved for us by the resurrection," inasmuch as "the facts are quite within the reach of the faculties and senses of ordinary men to ascertain and judge of, and if those facts are correctly recorded, we are as competent judges now as they were then, merely looking at the circumstances related." And he further maintains that it is not correct to say, as Mr. Hutton does, "that 'the miracles of Christ had little apparent part in the Gospel the Apostles preached.'" The most philosophic of the Evangelist-Apostles declares of the first miracle, in Cana, that Jesus thereby "manifested forth his glory (the glory as of the only-begotten of the Father), and his disciples believed on him." He makes an earnest seeker say to Christ, "No man can do these miracles that thou doest except God be with him." He complains of the Jews that "though he had done so many miracles before them, yet they believed not on him;" while Jesus himself is described by another as upbraiding those cities where most of his mighty works were done because they believed not; while, towards the close of the Gospel, St. John declares that the signs which Jesus did are written that we might believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God. Neither is it true that 'St. Peter alludes only to the transfiguration in addition to the death and resurrection of his Master.' In his very first address to the Jews, on the day of Pentecost, he speaks of 'Jesus of Nazareth, a man approved of God among you by miracles and wonders and signs, which God did by him in the midst of you, as ye yourselves also know;' and again, in his address to Cornelius and his company, he sets prominently forth 'how God anointed Jesus of Nazareth with the Holy Ghost and with power; and we,' he adds, 'are witnesses of all things which he did.'"

AMERICAN NOTES.

America possesses not only the oldest Methodist preacher in the world but the oldest Methodist newspaper. The latter is Zion's Herald, a Boston journal. The former is Father Boehm, who was born in Lancaster county, Pennsylvania, in 1775, and is therefore now in his ninety-fifth year. Old as he is, he still preaches in the large churches.

The Lutheran Observer mentions a striking instance of liberality in connection with one of the German Reformed Churches in New York. It had a debt upon it of 35,000 dollars, and the congregation were called together in order to consider whether they should accept an offer of 90,000 dollars which had been made for it. During the discussion a member arose and said: "Brethren, I am opposed to the sale of the church. Providence has put it into my power to relieve you of this indebtedness, and I feel it my duty to do so. It would, however, neither be just to me, nor best for you, that I should pay the debt alone. Do what you can towards reducing it, and I will assume the balance." The astonishment and delight of the congregation may be imagined. They raised among themselves about 10,000 dollars, and their generous brother pays the balance.

The Christian Recorder, of Philadelphia, the organ of the African Methodist Episcopal Church, contains several announcements from persons formerly in slavery who desire to ascertain the whereabouts of their missing relatives. We subjoin two samples of these notices:

"Information wanted of my sisters Margery and Mahala Cannon, and Stephen Cannon, my brother. They belonged to Joseph Neil. Margery fell to his daughter Eliza Ann Robinson. All of Seaford, Delaware. I left Delaware thirty-five years ago, since which time I have heard nothing definite. They were sold South. Any information please address to Somerset Cannon, Valley Forge, Chester County, Pennsylvania."

"Information wanted of Robert, George, Anthony, Winnie, and Lucy Murray, who were owned by Dr. Smith, in Upperville, Virginia. Robert went away before the war and George was sold. Any information of their whereabouts will be thankfully received by their mother, Hannah Murray. Address, &c."

In connection with the recent session of the Illinois Methodist Conference there was celebrated the ministerial jubilee of Peter Cartwright, "the Backwoods preacher." The Rev. W. M. Punshon sent a communication in which he dwelt on the labours through which Dr. Cartwright has passed—"labours apostolic in their extent, and prosecuted with a bravery like that of chivalry, and with a fidelity to God and to the souls of men which neither opposition nor discouragement could frighten." In his reply, after mentioning that he was the son of a Revolutionary soldier, and was in his 85th year, Mr. Cartwright said:

"I have no language to describe to you the situation of this frontier country. I could tell you a thousand tales that you would not believe of the scenes through which I have travelled. I have suffered a good deal in body, in mind, and in circumstances. I have been caught 500 miles from my father's house with but 75 cents in my pocket, in a strange land, on a blind horse, and not a garment on but what had come to the patch. I stood it three years, and then I returned home. I thought three years was a pretty good lesson; but I rallied again. Our early bishops were old bachelors; they wore small clothes and buckles at the knee, and if they could get a long pair of stockings and top-boots, and have their vests turned in, they felt very much like Methodist preachers, and young as I was they drilled me into it. McKendree was my presiding elder, and I was junior preacher the first time I ever travelled, and when we came to quarterly meeting conference, he asked the questions that all presiding elders ask: 'Are there any complaints or appeals?' There was a grave old class-leader, with straight coat and broad-brimmed hat, who rose and said, 'Yes, I have a complaint against the young brother.' Says McKendree, 'What is it, brother?' 'Why,' said he, 'the young brother is corrupting the morals of the young people, for he is following the fashions.' 'What fashion?' 'Why, he has got a pair of gallowases.' I see members of the Methodist Church now, who had they lived then would have been turned out of the Connexion. Well, I am not going to deliver a lecture on dress, but if you can afford it, I say, wear decent clothes."

I started out at an age of the world of which the present generation can form but a very limited conception. I lived through the log cabin dispensation, and I had been a preacher for several years before I saw a shingled roofed house of any description. . . . To-day I thank God that the chief thing that has borne me up is the comforts of religion. If I had been seeking for money I would not have travelled, for I knew that I could have made more money splitting rails than I could travelling a circuit when I started. It was not honour; there was no honour about it. It was to fulfil my own convictions of duty. There was an old Scotch doctor, who was an infidel, in the neighbourhood where my father lived, and when I got under very deep conviction my father sent for him to come and see what was the matter with me. The old doctor told me to poke out my tongue, fumbled over my pulse, and pronounced the disease a determination of blood to the head, or brain, and advised me to shave my head, and have a large blister-plaster put on. Well, now, I got full satisfaction out of that old doctor. After God converted my soul I was appointed to preach; but I did not know anything under the heavens about preaching, but they thought, because I could halloo a little, that I could preach, and when I came to open the services there was a young lady just before me that fell as if a rifle ball had entered her body. Well, I had never seen the like before, I did not know anything about it, and I frankly confess to you I did not know what to do. The old Scotch doctor hustled up and felt her pulse, and if her teeth had not been clinched he would have examined her tongue. He had a phial of hartshorn with him, and he rammed it to her nose, as if she had been a blind horse, but that did not move her nerves. Well, I did not know what to do; the doctor was grey-headed, and I a poor ignorant boy, but I concluded that he must quit that, and I went up to him, and said: 'Now don't do that again; the girl is crying for mercy, and I want you to get down on your knees and pray for her.' 'I never prayed in my life,' said he. 'Well,' said I, 'it is time you were at it.' I had never prayed in public in my life, but I got down and did the best I could, and just as I closed my prayer she sprang up like a deer and made for the doctor, and he ran like the fend was after him, when the idea struck me and I cried out, 'Doctor don't run, but just try the virtue of hartshorn to your nose.' He was like most other doctors, he could prescribe very freely, but he could not undertake his own prescriptions. I have come up to this Conference (for I have never missed but one in my life, and one General Conference), and I feel that I no longer have the strength to labour as a regular travelling preacher. I feel that I must retire; I thought so last Conference, but you saw proper to bid me go to the district and work out the fiftieth year. And now I retire from the regular work, not because I do not like it, for I say to you one and all, to the young preachers and to the old, that with all the losses and crosses, labours and sufferings peculiar to the life of a Methodist travelling preacher, I would take, if it was left to my choice, the same track over again with the same religion to bear me up, rather than be President of the United States. Glory to God, there is a religion that sustains a man and will bear him on and up and through. I have never tried to feel that pasteboard religion that will not allow a man to say 'Amen' or shout 'Glory.' I have no friendship at all for that kind of Christianity. A Christian still-born into the family of heaven is an anomaly. I love that religion that a man can feel and know for himself, that can support us under trials, that can bear anything and everything while God gives us His love in our hearts."

BIRMINGHAM.—The collections for the Queen's Hospital on Sunday last at our churches were: Church of the Messiah, £125. 1s.; Old Meeting-house, £48. 4s. 5d.; Newhall-hill, £10. 11s. 8d.; Hurst-street Mission, £7. 3s. 6d.; Church of the Messiah Mission, £2. 1s. 8d.; total, £193. 2s. 3d. Adding the amount collected at the Church of the Messiah (George Dawson's), £133. 12s., the total amount is £326. 14s. 3d.

BRIDPORT.—On Sunday last, sermons were preached by the Rev. S. Martin, of Trowbridge, to large congregations, on behalf of the Unitarian Sunday-schools. On the following evening, at a social meeting of the teachers of both schools, the Rev. R. L. Carpenter in the chair, Mr. Martin gave an instructive and animating address, fraught with the "experience which worketh hope."

LONDON: CARTER-LANE.—At their usual weekly meeting, last Friday evening, the elocution class, through their secretary, Mr. E. H. Scott, presented to their teacher a very beautifully bound copy of Tennyson's "Elaine," with Doré's illustrations. The inscription was as follows: "A testimonial of respect and gratitude to the Rev. J. Taylor, from the members of the Carter-lane Mission Elocution Class, who, conscious of not having done justice to his able tuition, yet desire to express their sense of his constant efforts to render them efficient." This was followed by the names of the respective members. Mr. Taylor in a few appropriate words thanked his class, not only for the very elegant present, but also for the quiet and unostentatious manner in which they had given it.

COMPULSORY EDUCATION.

No cry is more popular when a novel reform is proposed in this country, than the assertion that the scheme is "Un-English." Our national pride revolts from the idea of adopting a plan which has been tried and found successful elsewhere. To confess that the Germans or the Swiss can have made a discovery in politics which it is worth our while to adopt, is more than can be expected from the British Philistine. And when that plan has the misfortune to bear the ugly name of "Compulsory Education," we are up in arms immediately against the threatened interference with the cherished liberty of the subject, which the proposal involves. And yet we are glad to notice some signs which show that this un-English proposition is winning favour among the people. A crowded gathering of working men in the Birmingham Town Hall unanimously approved of this so-called encroachment on their liberty; a meeting of delegates from the Union of Lancashire and Cheshire Institutes, held in Manchester, on the 26th of last month, carried a resolution in its favour with about four dissentients only; at the distribution of prizes at the Manchester Mechanics' Institution, and at a similar meeting in the Manchester Town Hall, the favourable mention of compulsory education was sure to draw forth a hearty round of applause; so that we are almost led to believe that the time is coming when so necessary an element of educational reform may help, instead of retarding, the agitation for national education.

Fortunately, too, we have, with characteristic English inconsistency, introduced compulsory education in certain cases by the agency of our factory and other kindred acts. Since the year 1844, we have passed no less than eight acts of Parliament which compel employers to give no work to children unless they can present certificates of school attendance. These acts have undoubtedly done much good in promoting education, though they would have been more efficacious had they insisted upon the presentation of certificates of educational attainments, instead of mere attendance at school. But they have, at any rate, destroyed all the reality of the cry that compulsory education is un-English, and though we think that their provisions are most valuable, we cannot deny the assertion made by the advocates of general compulsion, that they come into force too late, and when least necessary. Two precious years at least of a child's life may have been wasted in idleness, as it may have been learning nothing up to its eighth year, and comes into the half-time school unprepared to reap the advantage it might otherwise have done from the opportunities there afforded, and unable therefore in the years it is compelled to attend school to obtain such a facile use of the rudimentary arts of knowledge as ever to be truly educated; so that many young men and women, when they have reached the age of twenty or twenty-one, are altogether unable either to read or write, though they have spent five years in a factory school. But, further, it cannot be denied that children in a factory or well-organised workshop inevitably learn something beside their trade. They are taught punctuality, order, obedience, honesty, and other moral virtues of incalculable value, which their compeers who are not so occupied do not find inculcated in the streets and in the fields.

Undeniable statistics show us that at least one million two hundred thousand children of school age are neither in school nor at work, and upon these no compulsion is brought to bear. They are left exposed to all the immoral influences and temptations of uncontrolled self-indulgence; and upon them no compulsion is brought to bear, unless they commit some crime which sends them to a Reformatory, or are committed by the magistrate to the Certified Industrial as vagrants. It appears to us that in most cases of this kind the wrong person is taken into the police court. The parent, and not the child, should be brought before the magistrate. And here we come to the class in which a judicious system of compulsion is needed. There is no necessity, in most instances, to force educated people to attend to the education of their children. They have too high a sense of the value which knowledge has been to them to withhold its advantages from their offspring. But the uneducated have no sense of their responsibility in this direction. They are aware of the necessity of providing food and clothing, and only the very worst class of the community deprive their little ones of the necessities of life; but knowledge is to them a luxury, the need of which they do not comprehend, and they require to be taught that they have no more right to leave the mind unsupplied with necessary food than the body. Here the law ought to step in. It has made it a crime, even now, to withhold food from a child, it ought to make it an equal, if not a greater, offence to deprive the child of the opportunities of learning. The fact that a man or woman is liable to punishment for starving his offspring, has never been thought to lessen the parental sense of responsibility, no more would the legal enforcement of the child's claim to education. On the contrary, the enactment of a compulsory system would only be recognising with the highest human sanctions of parental responsibility, and bringing the whole power of society to compel the fulfilment of such responsibility. We feel assured, also, that in a very short time the law would not be felt to be in the slightest degree burdensome. When a generation had passed over under the beneficial influence of general education, all men, with but very rare exceptions, would act as the educated classes do now, and would have become a law unto themselves, sending their children to school from a sense of duty, not from fear of punishment. Exceptions there would be; even the most perfect system of national education would not make the whole nation moral. And the compulsory clauses would be valuable to meet these exceptional cases. The authorities in Saxony, Prussia, and Switzerland are rarely indeed forced to have recourse to the compulsory clauses of their law, but they would never consent to their being repealed. They are a standing proof of the universal recognition by the community of the duty of the parent and of the right of the child. Most earnestly do we long for the day when we shall have equal right to rejoice in the possession of a truly national and compulsory system of education.

THE EXETER HUBBUB.

As we ventured last week to predict would be the case, the opposition to Dr. Temple's appointment, although Bishop Trower has declared that he will propose some one else, is clearly destined to have no practical result—unless it may be to make Dr. Pusey and his confères sigh more deeply to be relieved from the pressure of "the iron hand of the State." Dr. Temple, having been asked to disavow his participation in the opinions expressed by the other contributors to the "Essays and Reviews," has publicly stated that he will make no other declarations than those required by law. To allow that a bishop or rector, after he has been nominated by the proper authorities, is called upon to do anything more than this "would be so serious an infringement of the lawful liberty guaranteed to ministers of the Church that he dare not sanction it by his own example." He is sorry for the excitement caused by his nomination, but is confident that personal intercourse with the clergy of his diocese will dissipate all uncomfortable feeling. Canon Cook, the editor of the Speaker's Commentary, and the one man of any real distinction in the Exeter chapter, has from the first been in favour of the election of Dr. Temple; and the dean (Dr. Boyd), greatly to the affliction, we may be sure, of his Low Church friends, feeling evidently that the better part of valour is discretion, "cannot permit himself to commit an act of (as it seems to him) disrespect to the Crown, and unfairness to an individual, by promoting a refusal" to confirm the Queen's nomination. We may, therefore, take for granted that Dr. Temple will be elected, and that the Archbishop of Canterbury, whom Mr. Gladstone is understood to have consulted in the matter, will be ready to consecrate him.

But though the battle may be said to have been lost and won, the hurly-burly is by no means done. Several closely-printed pages of the Guardian are taken up with correspondence on the subject. His opponents (with the exception of Mr. Ken-naway and Mr. Perceval Ward) are utterly unknown men, nor do they contribute any fresh argument to the stock already employed, unless it be that "the evident volo Episcopari on the part of Dr. Temple savours strongly of presumption in rebus divinis." We are not aware that great reluctance has been shown by other nominees, whether High or Low, to be bishoped; but at any rate, as the Pall Mall suggests, conscious fitness is no worse than conscious unfitness. One writer thinks if two names, instead of one, were sent down to the electors, it would "do away with the awful mockery of the invocation of the Holy Ghost on what is after all a foregone conclusion." Another hopes that the appointment of "a clergyman of Dr. Temple's opinions and associations to the office of a bishop may open the eyes of the Church to see that, whether this appointment be tolerable or intolerable, whether it be persisted in or withdrawn, it is impossible for the Church long to submit to the present anomaly of what are called Crown appointments."

Some of the Evangelical journals are much more wroth, and unable to moderate the rant of their pens. One of them says, "It is to the everlasting disgrace and the indelible scandal of the Church of England that she has already one sceptic, one un-Christian prelate; but will Christian England tolerate two?" The Advertiser is quite sure (it is never wanting in assurance) that Dr. Temple believes neither the Apostles' Creed, nor the Nicene, nor the Athanasian. And if a few more are to join him on the episcopal bench it will become quite evident, and quite indisputable, that the Church of England has no definite faith of any kind. Nay, believing that he will be elected to-morrow, the Advertiser says, that same day the decree will go forth, "Cut it down! Why cumbereth it the ground?" His election signifies, so far as an election in a diocesan chapter can signify anything (not very complimentary that), that the principle is acknowledged that "conscience," that is, man, is lord; and that Scripture is nothing. This is the main result of Dr. Temple's paper; and those who say that they can find nothing heterodox in it do, in effect, say that this principle is, in their view, true. The chief "pillar and ground of the truth" has been, hitherto, the Established Church, with its ancient creeds and standards. But these are evidently vanishing away. Well-a-way!

The opposition to his appointment, however, has called forth testimonies on his behalf, of which Dr. Temple may justly feel proud. Mr. Mackarness, the bishop-designate of Oxford, and a High Churchman, says of him, "a more high-principled, hard-working, and true-hearted man it has never been my lot to know." Dr. Lake, the Dean of Durham, while regretting that he should have joined in "Essays and Reviews," contends "that since the time when this volume was attacked and condemned there has been no moment when, as a man of honour, he could publicly dissociate himself from its other authors;" and says, "I have never known a man who combines a firm Christian belief with such astonishing energy and such absolute self-forgetting devotion to duty." Mr. Furse, who ventures to think that "the maintenance of doctrine is not all the Church's work," and that "orthodoxy and ossification may be found together," testifies to the pure and lofty Christian life which Dr. Temple led in his undergraduate days at Oxford—a life not merely of blameless integrity and intellectual repute, but marked with "a bracing and kindling love of work, a robust and masculine sense of duty," which realised to a greater extent the true genius of Christianity than he had ever witnessed elsewhere. Mr. Lyttelton (spite of the Advertiser's assurance) says, "The fact is well known to all Dr. Temple's friends that he holds as strongly as any man the Catholic doctrine of the Divinity of our Lord, and is as strongly opposed as any man well can be to the Unitarian theology;" and, giving his own experience of Dr. Temple's work at Rugby, "Most of us who know that work are only ashamed to make any such statements about one whose earnestness of faith we feel to be so much greater than our own." And a "Liberal Evangelical," even in the Record writes, "Those who know Dr. Temple know also his earnest and unaffected piety, his religious sympathy, his power of drawing out the best side of every man, the contagious intensity of his love for his Lord and Master Jesus Christ, and of his faith in the great doctrines of our Church. Assuredly few greater or holier men have ever been consecrated."

To his catholicity of spirit we could give many testimonies. This from the Freeman will suffice. "In his bearing toward Dissenters he has always shown a genuinely liberal and Christian spirit, which his detractors would do well to imitate. His friendliness toward us has never been tainted with that offensive, patronising air which some Churchmen assume when they try to be liberal, and which makes their friendship harder for us to endure than their hostility." Unlike some, who can smile on Nonconformity in large cities where it is a great power, but who treat it very differently in small towns, "he has not gone to far-off places to talk about the duties of union and charity, but he has in his own earnest and manly way shown a most fraternal spirit toward the few, and, therefore, comparatively feeble Dissenters in his own town. When the Baptist minister of Rugby was leaving the town Dr. Temple presided at the farewell meeting, and spoke, not as one who deems doctrinal differences of no importance, but as one who can admire Christian consistency wherever he sees it, and rejoice in Christian usefulness in whatever section of the Church it may be found."

Of the non-appointment of a man like this well may Dr. Lake say, "the only body it could injure would be not Dr. Temple himself, but the English Church, by robbing it of the service of a noble mind, and of the affections of many who love Christian truth and justice."

FIRESIDE READINGS.

SOLITUDE.

BY ROBERT LEIGHTON.

How sweet the yoke of chosen solitude,
With the allurements of the town at hand,
To take or leave according to the mood!
How easy to withstand!

We let the buskined stage expend its wit,
The panorama of the streets go by,
The orator declaim unheard, and sit
At home in lonely joy.

The morning columns that with breakfast come,
Filled with the living drama of the age—
E'en them we can afford to leave for some Elizabethan page.

But solitude afar from all that moves
The wheels of history, the hearts of men,
Beyond the range of life's accustomed grooves—
How hard the yoke is then!

We do not live, but longingly exist
Upon the slow combustion of the heart,
Leisure unused, the end of being missed,
Craving the world apart.

Ah, then, the worthiest volume poorly meets
Our fancied wants; we hanker after news,
And lay down Shakspeare for the tattered sheets
That wrapt our last new shoes.

THE LOCUST PLAGUE.

THE Bombay Gazette, of October 8th, gives a sad account of a deluge of locusts which had swept for the second time this season over the Northern districts of Goojerat, devastating one of the most fertile regions of India, just as a magnificent harvest had ripened to perfection, and it was hoped would have afforded a surplussage for the famine-stricken country about Marwar. The appearance of these fearfully destructive creatures is said to have been something which it is difficult to describe in words. There was nothing peculiar in the weather, nor had been, to indicate that anything unusual was about to occur. They first appeared on Sunday afternoon. The day was fine, and a cool breeze from the north was playing over the yellowing cornfields. About four o'clock a long line of reddish cloud, which the beholders put down to the smoke from a large weed fire creeping slowly along the horizon, made its appearance, becoming denser as the line advanced, and extending itself on either flank. What it was remained a mystery to the uninitiated for an hour or so, and then, by the aid of glasses, it became possible to distinguish that the cloud was neither more nor less than a flight of rose-coloured locusts, thousands of millions in number, advancing steadily, in huge battalions, before the wind. After a while, the leading swarms arrived over head, and the sight was wonderful in the extreme. Above, flying about fifty deep, and extending apparently to a thickness of ten or twelve feet, they were passing over with the greatest rapidity, the sharp screech of their wings, making a strange sound as though a myriad of tiny saws were at work. In front the air was simply filled with them, so as to obstruct the view, the scene resembling a very heavy snow-storm descending diagonally before a strong wind. And so, for two hours, they continued to pass over, when darkness fell. The whole night through, the air was filled with a sort of purring sound, which proceeded from the trees, especially the tamarinds, upon which, at daylight, they were discovered clustering in enormous masses, as though some Brobdingnagian hive of hornets had swarmed on every branch. In size these creatures were about an inch and a quarter long, with large, double, gauzy wings; the body, as well as these, being of a rose tint, and the forelegs armed with strong serrated points, by means of which they seized firmly hold of whatever they alighted upon. In head, and in shape generally, they resembled the large grasshoppers which we meet with, of all sizes and colours, on black-soil fields. Judging from the fact that, as the swarms passed over they literally rained pellets of excrement nearly as large as those of a rat, and that these presented the appearance of perfectly digested matter, it would appear that not only are these creatures endowed with a terrible appetite, but that their organisation is of a high order. Nevertheless, that stupidity which always seems to attach to individual members of a vast body acting under some common impulse, appeared to attend upon them, for they exhibited barely any fear of capture, and seemed quite as happy when deprived of their wings as with them. The crows, and a few other birds, partially revenged mankind upon them, hawking for and devouring them in great quantities; but they were far too few to make any perceptible impression. Wherever a swarm alighted, they steadily set to work to devour everything green which came in their way. The cultivators, with flags and tom-toms, did their best; but it was but little after all, for, as one flight was induced to move on, thousands and millions followed in their track, and where they made up their minds to sit down and eat, there resistance was all but vain.

Large branches of trees gave way under their weight, and large green trees in five minutes were left quite bare. The bajri and jowari, which had become almost ripe for the sickle, were the special objects of their attacks; and numbers of the ryots, despairing of escape, proceeded to cut their fields as they stood, to save the fodder, at any rate, by sacrificing the grain. As the sun became warm on the following day, all places where the locusts had taken up their quarters for the night became alive with the signs of preparation; and by nine o'clock the whole body was again in motion, either hovering from one field to another, or setting out in great masses upon their march again. Their general direction was south-easterly. In some cases, where, perhaps, dyspepsia had supervened, huge flights had lit upon the roads, giving them the appearance of having been covered by a rose-coloured snowfall. By the evening of the second day they had entirely disappeared.

The Gazette says this is a thing about which we ought to know a great deal more than we do. Here is a magnificent tract of country, laughing with fertility, presenting thousands of square miles of splendid corn-fields just ready for the sickle, when, without a sign of warning, a cloud suddenly darkens the whole northern horizon, and, in an hour or so, myriads on myriads of huge, voracious insects, coming no one knew whence, and going no one knew whither, produced no one knows why, and hardly even how, and dying always at some place a considerable distance from where anybody happens to see them, appear settling in swarms upon tree and field, and clearing it of vegetation, just as a flight of pigeons clear up a handful of scattered peas. Nothing offensive or defensive that humanity can do avails. Myriads may perish, but there are myriads enough behind to do that which they would have done; and when they have gone, all the ruined cultivator knows is that they have come and gone; that yesterday he was rich and hopeful, and that to-day he is poor and despairing; and that, for aught he can tell, just as many myriads more may come again the day after to-morrow. It is true we know that the creatures spring from eggs, laid in moist sand, that one parent locust can produce a hundred young; that they first appear in the grub condition, crawling en masse in one direction, and devouring everything in their way, just as, when older, they fly en masse in one direction, and do the same. We also know that, if they happily come to the sea, they are destroyed. But that is all. And the Gazette thinks Government should make it its business to learn a great deal more. It should know where these creatures breed, and when; it should know the method of seeking or destroying the egg-bags, the birds and animals which are most destructive to them, and whether smoke, or rocket, or other means would have the effect of scaring away a swarm manifesting intentions to stay its march and alight.

MAHOMET.

THE Quarterly Review has an article on "Islam," evidently from the pen of Mr. Deutsch, whose account of the "Talmud" excited so much interest a short time since, which contains the following sketch of the Arabian prophet, the materials for which are drawn from the traditions:—"He was of middle height, rather thin, but broad of shoulders, wide of chest, strong of bone and muscle. His head was massive, strongly developed. Dark hair—slightly curled—flowed in a dense mass down almost to his shoulders. Even in advanced age it was sprinkled by only about twenty grey hairs, produced by the agonies of his 'revelations.' His face was oval-shaped, slightly tawny of colour. Fine, long, arched eyebrows were divided by a vein which throbbed visibly in moments of passion. Great black, restless eyes shone out from under long, heavy eyelashes. His nose was large, slightly aquiline. His teeth, upon which he bestowed great care, were well set, dazzling white. A full beard framed his manly face. His skin was clear and soft, his complexion 'red and white,' his hands were as 'silk and satin'—even as those of a woman. His step was quick and elastic, yet firm, and as that of one 'who steps from a high to a low place.' In turning his face he would also turn his full body. His whole gait and presence were dignified and imposing. His countenance was mild and pensive. His laugh was rarely more than a smile. 'Oh, my little son!' reads one tradition, 'hadst thou seen him thou wouldst have said thou hadst seen a sun rising.' 'I,' says another witness, 'saw him in a moonlight night, and sometimes I looked at his beauty and sometimes at the moon, and his dress was striped with red, and he was brighter and more beautiful to me than the moon.'

"In his habits he was extremely simple, though he bestowed great care on his person. His eating and drinking, his dress and his furniture, retained, even when he had reached the fulness of power, their almost primitive nature. He made a point of giving away all 'superfluities.' The only luxuries he indulged in were, besides arms, which he highly prized, certain yellow boots, a present from the Negus of Abyssinia. Perfumes, however, he loved passionately, being most sensitive of smell. Strong drinks he abhorred.

"His constitution was extremely delicate. He was nervously afraid of bodily pain, he would sob and roar under it. Eminently unpractical in all common things of life, he was gifted with mighty powers of imagination, elevation of mind, delicacy, and refinement of feeling. 'He is more modest than a virgin behind her curtain,' it was said of him. He was most indulgent to his inferiors, and would never allow his awkward little page to be scolded, whatever he did. Ten years, said Anas, his servant, was I about the prophet, and he never said so much as 'Uff' to me. He was very affectionate towards his family. One of his boys died on his breast in the smoky house of the nurse, a blacksmith's wife. He was very fond of children. He would stop them in the streets, and pat their little cheeks. He never struck any one in his life. The worst expression he ever made use of in conversation was, 'What has come to him?—may his forehead be darkened with mud!' When asked to curse some one he replied, 'I have not been sent to curse, but to be a mercy to mankind.' 'He visited the sick, followed any bier he met, accepted the invitation of a slave to dinner, mended his own clothes, milked his goats, and waited upon himself,' relates summarily another tradition. He never first withdrew his hand out of another man's palm, and turned not before the other had turned. His hand, we read elsewhere—and traditions like these give a good index of what the Arabs expected their prophet to be—was the most generous, his breast the most courageous, his tongue the most truthful; he was the most faithful protector of those he protected, the sweetest and most agreeable in conversation; those who saw him were suddenly filled with reverence, those who came near him loved him, they who described him would say, 'I have never seen his like either before or after.' He was of great taciturnity, and when he spoke he spoke with emphasis and deliberation. No one could ever forget what he said. He was, however, very nervous and restless withal, often low-spirited, downcast as to heart and eyes. Yet he would at times suddenly break through those broodings, become gay, talkative, jocular, chiefly among his own. He would then delight in telling amusing little stories, fairy tales, and the like. He would romp with the children and play with their toys—as, after his first wife's death, he was wont to play with the dolls his new baby-wife had brought into his house."

NEW UNITARIAN CHAPEL AT GORTON. LAYING THE CORNER STONE.

ON Saturday afternoon last the corner stone of a new chapel was laid in the presence of about 1,200 people by Richard Peacock, Esq. Shortly after three o'clock the friends, who had assembled in the old chapel adjoining, followed by the Sunday scholars, walked in procession to the new site, where a temporary gallery had been erected for their accommodation. A platform, extending over the centre of the new chapel, had been erected for the scholars who, with their teachers, led the singing. Among those present were the Revs. G. H. Wells, M.A., Dr. Beard, H. E. Dowson, B.A., W. H. Herford, B.A., Henry Green, M.A., T. E. Poynting, Brooke Herford, James Drummond, B.A., Jeffery Worthington, James Black, M.A., J. N. Porter, T. Carter, L. Taplin, M.A., J. Harrop, F. Revitt, and D. Berry; Messrs. Joseph Wood, sen., Joseph Wood, jun., John Wood, R. T. Heape, Royston Oliver (Rochdale), T. B. Wood (Middleton), Thomas Worthington, the architect (Manchester), Henry Bayley (Stalybridge), Alfred Aspland, Samuel Broadrick (Dukinfield), H. T. Darnton (Mayor of Ashton), John Thornely, Thomas Thornely, Orlando Oldham (Hyde), Major Wilkinson, G. Wilkinson, E. Wilkinson (Stockport), Joseph Smethurst, G. H. Grimshaw, S. Grimshaw, Thomas Clay, the builder (Gorton), John Armstrong, Harry Rawson, H. J. Leppoc, George Taylor (Manchester), and John Taylor (Haughton).

A hymn having been sung, and prayer offered by Mr. WELLS,

Mr. STANSFIELD GRIMSHAW presented to Mr. Peacock a silver trowel for the occasion, on which was the following inscription:

"Presented to Richard Peacock, Esq., C.E. and J.P., of Gorton Hall, on his laying the corner stone of Gorton Chapel, by the members of the congregation, October 30th, 1869."

A bottle containing the Unitarian Herald, the Inquirer, several newspapers of the district, and various coins of the realm, having been deposited in a cavity underneath the stone, a brass plate was placed over it on which was engraved the following:

"Erected for the worship of God, anno Domini 1869, by Richard Peacock, Esq., of Gorton Hall, civil engineer and justice of the peace, and presented by him to the congregation of Protestant Dissenters assembling for worship in an old chapel near this site, called Gorton Chapel, bearing date A.D. 1703. Minister, Rev. G. H. Wells, M.A. Building Committee, Brown David, Clay Thomas, Grimshaw George Henry, Hadwen William, Peacock Richard, Wells George Henry. Architect, Thomas Worthington, Manchester. Builders, Thomas Clay and Sons, Audenshaw."

The stone was then formally laid, a son and daughter of Mr. Peacock and a son of the minister (Mr. Wells), each furnished with a mallet, rendering assistance, to the great gratification of the assembly.

Mr. PEACOCK then said: Ladies and gentlemen, I need not say how proud I am to have performed, with the assistance of my juvenile helpers, the ceremony of laying this corner-stone. I am glad to see so considerable an assembly of friends and fellow-worshippers gathered together on this occasion. It is an evidence of the great interest all take in the work of which this is a part. When I first became connected with this neighbourhood, nearly thirty years ago, there was only one church and another chapel, in addition to the one we assemble in, within the township. It is true the population was much less at that time, and for that reason perhaps the demands for church accommodation were as fully met as they are now. Our old chapel bears date 1703, and the earliest date at which I have any reliable return of the population of Gorton is for the year 1801, when the number of inhabitants is given at 1,167. I believe they now number 20,000, which is about equal to 800 to the square mile. And when I tell you that during all this time, and in the midst of all this increase of population, there is only one place of worship in the township designated Unitarian, and that that is our old chapel built 166 years ago, you will naturally conclude that either our forefathers had large hearts and built chapels big enough for future generations, or that we have been sluggards as regards the progress made in promoting our religious tenets, or that the faith we hold is objectionable—or, to say the least of it—not a popular one. As regards the first, I believe the men who built our old chapels had both large and sound hearts. I also think that the word sluggard may not be inappropriate in the sense that we do not attempt in any force to proselytise either at home or abroad. (Hear, hear.) But I do not admit that our faith is an objectionable one, though it may have been unpopular. (Hear, hear.) Bigotry and intolerance are, however, now fast passing away; and thanks to our glorious constitution, we have in this country comparative freedom in all things, not only in politics, but in that greater matter—religion. (Applause.) And now, my good friends, permit me to inform those whom we look upon as visitors, and who may not be so well informed as to the necessity for a new chapel, that the ceremony of this day is being performed because the old chapel is fast falling into decay, and has become scarcely safe to assemble in; that the accommodation is no longer equal to our growing requirements; and that last, though to my feeling not least, I am taking the share it has pleased God to enable me to take in the erection of this building as a token of thanksgiving and in fulfilment of a pledge to Almighty God for the restoration to health and strength of some of the dear ones of my own family from severe affliction and illness. (Hear, hear.) For these reasons, then, I solemnly declare the corner stone of this chapel to be duly laid; the forerunner of a building to be hereafter dedicated to the teaching of the plain and simple truths of Christianity, and to the worship of the one true God. (Applause.)

The hymn "Nearer my God to Thee" was then sung, and the Lord's Prayer chanted by the scholars, after which the company went to tea in the schoolroom adjoining.

The following description will be read with interest:

"The new chapel is situated on the Hyde-road, about three miles from the city of Manchester, on land adjoining the present schools and old chapel, and will consist of a nave 77ft. long, 21ft. wide; north and south aisles, each 70½ft. long, 10½ft. wide, making a total width of 42ft. (inside); communion space or chancel 25ft. long, 19ft. wide, raised above the floor of the nave by three steps; organ chamber on the north side of chancel, and vestry on the south side (with heating chamber under). The tower is on the north side, fronting the turnpike road, the lower part forming the principal entrance to the chapel, and is surmounted by a plain spire, which rises to a height of 100ft. from the ground. In the upper stage of the tower it is intended to place the bells, for which proper provision will be made. There is also a porch on the opposite side, intended chiefly for the use of the school children. The chapel will afford easy and comfortable sittings for 230 adults, 140 children, and 24 singers in the choir, in all 400 persons; but would really accommodate from 500 to 600 should occasion require. The Building is designed in the Gothic style of architecture, and may be more particularly described as 'Geometric Decorated.' It will be faced entirely with stone on the outside, having ashlar dressings of Darley Dale stone to the doors, windows, buttresses, angles of tower, &c., and the spire will be wholly built of the same description of stone. Internally the walls will be of brick, plastered; the piers between the nave and aisles (which divide the length into six bays), and the shafts to the chancel arch will, however, be of polished marble, and the arches above of stone. The roof will be open-timbered, and all internal woodwork, seats, doors, and other joiners' work, of pitch pine, stained and varnished. The pulpit, reading desk, communion table, font, and other fittings are not yet determined; but it is expected that ample funds will be forthcoming to finish them handsomely, and materially enrich the general effect of the building. The chapel will be heated by hot-water pipes, and special attention will be given to render both the warming and ventilation as effective as possible. Mr. Thomas Worthington is the architect, and Messrs. Clay and Sons, of Audenshaw, the contractors for the building; the amount of their estimate being £5,504. This sum, however, is exclusive of the marble pillars and stone arches to the clerestory, and of the fittings also."

TEA MEETING.

Upwards of 300 persons sat down to a substantial tea, after which Mr. PEACOCK presided. He opened the meeting by observing: I said a few words to you this afternoon about our chapel. My good friend, Mr. Wells, has furnished me with some information in reference to our schools. When the question of Sunday-schools was first introduced into this district, about 1786, the children belonging to those who worshipped in what is now known as the "Parish Church," and the children of those who attended our old chapel, met on common ground in what is called "Gorton Old School,"—now occupied as a day school. For many years the children were conducted thence by their respective teachers to worship wherever their parents assembled. On the breaking-up of this "happy unity," it was found necessary to occupy the small building adjacent to our old chapel which would not accommodate more than thirty children. This state of things went on until Mr. Wells came among us about thirty years ago, when he caused the elder scholars to meet him for instruction in the old chapel, but for many years it was found impossible to accommodate the children who sought admission. At that time the greatest number that could be taught in chapel and school combined was about seventy, and that at very great inconvenience. Mr. Wells, however, laboured on until it was necessary to provide further accommodation. Many obstacles occurred, but were at length overcome by the purchase of a plot of land by Mr. Wells and myself parallel with Hyde-road, and in the year 1863 we had the gratification to see erected, by the help of a portion of the congregation—some of whom have passed away—the building in which we are now assembled—(hear, hear)—with its class rooms and other conveniences. We can here accommodate four hundred children, and I have the great gratification of knowing that a large number assemble within these walls every Sunday, and that the staff of teachers—some of whom are of the highest order—number over fifty. It is also highly gratifying to know that a class of adults of both sexes, numbering about 100, meet here for instruction on two evenings of the week during the winter months. These are under the superintendence of our worthy minister and the elder Sunday-school teachers—themselves having been trained in the Sunday-school. I believe the female teachers who attend these classes deserve great praise for their attendance and assiduity. (Hear, hear.) As a large employer of labour in the district, I have reason to know (and I think it is but due to Mr. Wells and his helpers in this good work of teaching that I should say it) that some of the best workmen and the best servants in our establishment have been educated in connection with the Sunday-schools belonging to our old chapel. (Hear, hear, and applause.) I fear I have to-day dwelt too long upon matters connected with our chapel and schools. The subject of education is, however, of such importance that I cannot sit down without wishing those who are exerting themselves in promoting and extending it God speed. (Loud applause.) Educate! be it national, denominational, or secular. Educate! and if a preference is to be given to either sex—though I hope this will not be—I say educate the women—(applause)—for my observations through life have convinced me that an educated mother will look better after the general training and culture of her children than the father; and I state advisedly that our brightest ornaments in society are men and women who claim educated and enlightened mothers. (Loud applause.)

The Rev. G. H. WELLS said: The occasion that brings us together is not a usual one, but to myself and some of us present here it is a very interesting one. For many years I have looked forward to some such occasion as this, and now, with the good heart and cordial support of our friends, we are within sight of our object. We are living in a period of change, when old modes of working will no longer suit or satisfy, and we must conform to new methods of thinking and acting—we must go on with the times. One of these changes to which we are brought is the erection of this new place of worship—to new and perhaps more attractive forms of architecture, suited to the altered wants and tastes of the present age. It is with a feeling of gratitude, though with some long lingering look behind, that we contemplate bidding adieu to the venerable meeting-house where we ourselves have assembled many a day and year, and where our forefathers assembled and found a shelter for the quietude of worship and the sanctity of conscience in times when religious liberty was less understood than happily it is now. But though we are willing to leave the old building, we still carry with us the same principles, the same great truths, the same religion which made the place sacred to us. We change our place of meeting, but we do not change our principles. Religion is like God, the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever. It shines on in its sameness of splendour through all the ages. It gave strength and comfort to our forefathers who fought Liberty's battles, who laboured, and we enter into their labours. And we trust in the same Divine

Being, and in the same power of religious truth, to minister strength and hope to our descendants, and to make them carry forward the work which we leave uncompleted. The foundation stone now laid is an earnest that we desire to build on a good foundation—even on the Rock of Ages. We build not on the sandy rock of tradition or church authority; but with Paul we say, "Our trust is in the living God, who is the Saviour of all men." The house which we hope to rear, and the cornerstone of which is now laid, is to be dedicated to God our Father in the name of him who taught us to say "Our Father," and to feel our brotherhood. To the great duties of life, to the broad principles of our common Christianity, this building will be set apart. In no spirit of sectarianism, or contempt, or ill-will to any of our Christian brethren, do we rear this place. Not even in any controversial spirit do we apply ourselves to our work, for we believe that however we may differ in creeds, yet, wherever there is the spirit of Christ, there is a true church. Our doors will be open to all; but we shall be anxious not so much to proselyte to an opinion as to change men from sin to righteousness. We hope in this place to do our part, to spread knowledge and increase charity, and diffuse the spirit of Christ wherever our influence extends. Here men will meet after the toils of the week are ended, to refresh their minds with the elevating and sustaining influence of religion. Here we shall meet as men and brethren to strengthen each other's hands for good, and encourage one another in all right works; to instruct youth, to support age, to comfort sorrow, to be the dispensers of such moral and material blessings as we are privileged to bestow, helps to mind and body: this is our mission; this is our work; and our reward is before us, because our work is with us. May none of us ever prove unfaithful to the ideal we have here set up; and may this building which we begin to-day remain to be a sign to after times of the importance which we attach to our principles—the sacrifice we have made, and are yet willing to make for them. But I pause, and instead of indulging in anticipations of the future, I must glance at the facts of the passing hour. It would be a foolish and ill-timed modesty not to say how very largely we are indebted to one individual. The elder members of the congregation have passed away. In their day they did their part, and no doubt it was to them a great and important work; and could they now be with us, they would be anxious to secure to their descendants and to us the blessings for which they so earnestly laboured. But we should never have been able to accomplish this great work had not a gracious Providence moved the heart of one individual to attempt its accomplishment. I may be permitted to say, as the minister of the congregation, how very grateful I am for all the assistance that has been rendered; and I may say, in the name of the congregation, how thankful they are for what has been done. They have this day seen the foundation of a building laid, not to fame, but to God; not for the purposes of worldly distinction or human display, but a votive-offering to God and goodness, to Christian truth and to immortal hope. But I have said enough. The individual who could engage in such an undertaking as this builds not for himself but for the good of others; and I do hope that in this busy neighbourhood, where so many are well and usefully employed, there may be found with many, a place in their hearts for the still small voice of wisdom and an attentive ear for the dictates of goodness and truth.

The Rev. Dr. BEARD was then called upon, and delivered a very interesting and eloquent address. After bearing his testimony to the excellent arrangements of the day, he spoke at some length, in terms which were very warmly responded to by the meeting, of the labours of Mr. Wells at Gorton, and thanked Mr. Peacock for his great liberality as a benefit not only to the congregation at Gorton, but to our churches throughout the country. He then urged upon his audience the great significance of the struggle that was going on between authority and the traditional element in religious matters, and the rights of the individual conscience.

The meeting was also addressed by Mr. Stansfield Grimshaw, who thanked Mr. Peacock on behalf of the congregation for his liberal gift, by the Revs. Brooke Herford and James Drummond, B.A., and by Messrs. Alfred Aspland and H. T. Darnton, mayor of Ashton. The Rev. William Gaskell was prevented from being present, and offering his good wishes, by the state of his health.

MINISTERS' BENEVOLENT SOCIETY.

THE seventeenth annual meeting of this society was held in Birmingham, on Wednesday, Oct. 27th; the president, the Rev. S. BACHE, in the chair. The balance-sheet, presented by the treasurer, Mr. T. KENRICK, afforded a favourable view of the present condition of the society's funds. He was, however, unable to report many additions to the list of honorary members, the income from annual subscriptions remaining nearly the same with that of the preceding year. No donations had been received, and only one congregational collection (from Horsham). He, however, announced a legacy of £100, duty free, from the late Miss Downing, of Cheltenham.—The following officers were appointed for the ensuing year: President, Mr. A. F. OSLER; vice-presidents, the Revs. S. Hunter and D. Maginnis; Mr. Kenrick and Dr. Russell were re-elected as treasurer and secretary, and Mr. Hornblower and Mr. Warden as auditors. The following is the report of the directors:

"The amount of the grants made during the past year is £490, being £20 in excess of those made during the preceding year. The present number of recipients is fourteen, two having been added to the list during the year. Two have died. Nine beneficiary members have been elected since the last annual meeting, and three ministers await election at the next meeting of the board of directors. One member has received back his subscriptions on retiring from the ministry, agreeably with law 8. The present number of beneficiary members is one hundred and eleven."

"The directors cannot leave this part of their report without noticing the loss which the society has sustained in the death of three of its most valued beneficiary members, the Revs. W. McKean, R. B. Aspland, and Francis Bishop."

After referring to the work of these ministers, the report continues:

"The directors feel that they cannot offer a more striking illustration of the value of the Ministers' Benevolent Society than by adding that of these gentlemen Mr. McKean derived timely aid from its funds during the period of his decline; and that the widow of Mr. Bishop also looks to it for that help, which her late husband was precluded from securing for her through other means during his useful life. The past history of the society affords similar testimony to the urgent need which exists for the help it is so well calculated to afford. Since its foundation in October, 1852, thirty deaths have occurred among its beneficiary members; of these the representatives of sixteen have received or are still receiving assistance from its fund, and in five of these cases the member had also availed himself of that assistance which was afterwards to be continued to his widow or family. Five others were in receipt of benefit at the time of their death, but left no representatives, making a total of twenty-one out of the thirty deceased members, who either in their own persons or in that of their families, have depended upon the society; and to this number must be added three others who are at present availing themselves of its benefits."

"In looking to the means they possess for answering claims which will hereafter be made upon them, the directors would say that although the balance sheet for this year shows a favourable result, yet, with the certainty of increasing demands, they would appeal to the friends of the society not to relax their interest in its behalf. This year the treasurer has received no donation, and only one congregational collection, namely, the usual one from Horsham, though he has to report the receipt of a legacy of £100, duty free, from the late Miss Downing, of Cheltenham."

"Circumstances to which it is not necessary here to refer more particularly, have lately drawn special attention to the necessity of a supply of educated ministers, for the prosperity of the religious body to which we belong; whatever other influences may be created for attaining this object, the subject of a livelihood for the minister cannot be left out of the question. The Ministers' Benevolent Society has no relation with the important subject of ministers' salaries; but it steps in in cases wherein the deficiency at present existing in this particular is most keenly felt. Though it is unable to secure for a minister a competence during his period of active service, it can at least receive him when disabled by age or infirmity, and promise to do something towards relieving the natural anxiety he must feel for those who are dependent upon him for support, and for whose welfare he is unhappily too often precluded by his position for providing, when their present means of support are withdrawn."

MIDLAND CHRISTIAN UNION.

THE annual meeting of this society was held at the Church of the Messiah, Birmingham, on Tuesday week. Among those present were the Revs. S. Bache, C. Clarke, H. W. Crosskey, B. Wright, E. Myers, J. Wilson (Birmingham), W. Cochrane (Cradley), D. Maginnis, G. Knight (Stourbridge), G. Heavyside (Coventry), H. McKean (Oldbury), H. Eachus (Coseley), J. Birks (Kingswood), J. Kedwards (Lye), C. F. Biss (Wolverhampton), Messrs. Herbert New (Evesham), J. White (Dudley), J. and W. Grainger (Coseley), J. Kertland (Wolverhampton), S. B. Whitfield, I. R. Mott, W. Earl, B. Smith, G. R. Twinn, A. B. Matthews, S. Greenway, R. D. Kneebone, H. Payton (Birmingham), &c.

Public worship commenced at three o'clock, the Rev. GEORGE HEAVYSIDE conducting the devotional services. The Rev. H. W. CROSSKEY preached from Eph. ii., 19-22, an eloquent and Catholic sermon on "The Church of Christ."

At the close of the service the business meeting was held, the Rev. CHARLES CLARKE in the chair.

The secretary, the Rev. D. MAGINNIS, having read the minutes of the previous general meeting, the thanks of the meeting were voted to Mr. Crosskey for his "admirable discourse: its inspiring tone and its Catholic spirit," and to Mr. Heavyside, for conducting the introductory services.

Henry Holland, Esq., Mayor of Birmingham, was elected president for the ensuing year; Mr. S. B. Whitfield, treasurer; and Rev. H. W. Crosskey, secretary. A committee and auditors were then appointed, after which thanks were voted to the ministers and lay preachers who supply the pulpits of the preaching stations, to the Rev. D. Maginnis, for his services as secretary during the past two years and to the chairman, for presiding.

In the evening there was a snaffle. The new president, the mayor, who had been announced to preside, was unavoidably absent in consequence of a severe family bereavement. In his much regretted absence, Mr. S. B. WHITFIELD (treasurer) was called to the chair, and gave in succession the following sentiments: "The strength and weakness of our liberal Churches for missionary work," "The Midland Christian Union," "The progress of liberal opinion in the Churches around us," "An increased supply of able and earnest men for the ministry of our Church," "Our Sunday-school Conference," "The liberation of education in school and college from sectarian restraints," which were spoken to briefly, but ably and earnestly, by the Revs. C. Clarke, H. W. Crosskey, H. McKean, and E. Myers; and Messrs. Herbert New, H. Payton, B. Smith, and the chairman.

NORTH MIDLAND PRESBYTERIAN AND UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

THE annual meeting of this society took place at the Great Meeting, Leicester, on Tuesday, the 26th of October. Divine service was held at noon. The Rev. R. A. ARMSTRONG, B.A., of Nottingham, led the devotional service. The preacher was the Rev. Charles Wicksteed, B.A., of Liverpool. There were present the Revs. John Ferrar, B.A., T.C.D. (Ashford and Flagg), W. W. Robinson (Boston), H. W. Ellis (Hinckley), W. Shakespeare (Ilkeston), W. Mitchell (Leicester), C. C. Coe (Leicester), J. J. Bishop, B.A. (Loughborough), A. W. Worthington, B.A. (Mansfield), C. L. Whitham (Nottingham), J. L. Short (Sheffield), H. Hill (Stannington), G. Wooller (Newark), J. T. Cooper (Buxton), and C. Berry (Leicester); and Messrs. Clephan, Mott, Stone, A. Paget, Kempson, E. Smith, Gill, Burgess, F. Johnson, Davidson, Hawkins, Aves, Deakin, Dare, Garner, Whitmore, Frith, Riley, Dobell, Fisher, Handley, Vallance, and many other friends.

Mr. WICKSTEED preached on the true principle of union among Christian worshippers.

He pointed out the immense variety of thought and character among nations and men, and how the gospel in its first preachers, and in its oral and its written traditions, met that variety. The history of the church—in spite of the artificial distinction introduced between orthodox and heretical—showed that that variety of ministration had been continued—to the contemplative, the intellectual, the ethical and practical, the devotional and sentimental, the enthusiastic and passionate nature of man. Christian unity could not consist in an identity of opinion, and an identity of character—as these must and did vary, not only with every Church, but with every age, nation, and individual. The basis of a true Christian unity must lie in the acknowledgment of this variety. But while the broad bosom of the Church must receive all these varieties, the separate communities of which the whole was composed must have each its own homogeneity or agreement, and this agreement must be intellectual as well as moral. Christianity was pre-eminently a religion of thought and of doctrine, and on these in fact the main specialties of its moral and spiritual character rested. Love to God and man, he was happy to think was not the "differentia" of the Christian religion, but was common to all the higher faiths of man. He congratulated the association on its name, "Presbyterian and Unitarian," as in the first was presented the tradition of its liberty of thought, and in the second was embodied one of the very highest and holiest of the results of the exercise of that liberty.

At 1-30 the members of the Association and the visitors lunched in the upper schoolroom, and the proverbial hospitality of Leicester was fully maintained. After lunch, the Rev. C. C. COE took the chair, and the annual report having been read by the Rev. A. W. Worthington, the chairman called on Mr. Kempson to propose its adoption, which was seconded by Mr. Edward Smith.

The Rev. CHARLES BERRY then rose to propose that the thanks of the meeting should be given to the Rev. Charles Wicksteed for this appropriate and eloquent sermon, and to the Rev. R. A. Armstrong, for conducting the devotional services. Having alluded to the ingenuity, novelty, force of reason, and felicity of illustration displayed by the sermon of the morning, he said he was probably the oldest Unitarian minister in this country. But he did not remember an instance of a person who had retained the vivacity, freshness, and vigour of youth in mature manhood to the degree that his friend Mr. Wicksteed, had done so. In his retirement he often reflected on the slow progress of the Unitarian body. He was speaking in the presence of younger ministers, and he hoped they would imitate and excel their predecessors, for he believed that, though our numbers were small, our principles had produced great blessings in society. We had done much to subdue the spirit of bigotry abroad. (Applause.) Our principles were apostolic, and would in the end prevail, but not without strenuous effort from us. Yet truth must finally prevail. (Loud applause.) After appreciative allusion to the conduct of the service by Mr. Armstrong, the speaker resumed his seat.

Mr. MOTT said it was a good thought to unite the young, from whom much was expected, with a minister who was already known as Mr. Wicksteed was known. Mr. Wicksteed's discourse united and blended advanced and conservative thought. After some very searching remarks in reference to the gradual disintegration of worshipping societies, and the possibility that on Mr. Wicksteed's theory, which he (Mr. Mott) fully believed to be the true one, public worship must ultimately cease,—he said he had pleasure in seconding the vote of thanks.

The CHAIRMAN, in putting the motion to the meeting, said he had been delighted to find himself agreeing throughout with the preacher. It was pleasant to him to hear so forcible and clear an exposition of the views he had himself often endeavoured to put forth. His congregation had, from Mr. Wicksteed at any rate, taken it all in. He only wished all ministers were like him. They had sustained heavy losses in the association, but it was a pleasure to him to welcome his friend Mr. Armstrong as a new comér.

The Rev. C. WICKSTEED was greeted with applause. He said it was impossible for him to say that he had listened to the kind remarks of the previous speakers without gratitude and pleasure. He liked to be in Leicester and among Leicester people, but his great pleasure had been in hearing his old friend, Mr. Berry; he was delighted to see him retaining so much of his ancient vigour of body and mind. He rejoiced that he, the kindly, genial, public-spirited and gentlemanly minister—whom Dr. Parr had characterised as worthy to be called a classical scholar—still lived to come among them and shed his cheering influence upon them, and he had himself deemed it a privilege to be present to hear his truly wonderful speech. (Applause.) Referring to the remark of Mr. Mott, that the principle of his morning address was sound, but must inevitably lead to such a disintegration as to make social worship at length impossible, he said, that any one who knew the name of Mott must know that it would be connected with acuteness of thought—(laughter and applause);—but while Mr. Mott had truly pursued one line of consideration to a possibly logical result, there were parallel lines of thought that would lead to other results, and the integral conclusion must be composed of all. Thus there was a “logic of the heart,” as well as of the head, and as long as the human race existed, eye would speak to eye, and heart to heart, and communion, religious communion, would be an undying want. We had indeed an individual nature, which must be left free and could not be tampered with, but we had also a social nature, which led us to make use of our intellectual and spiritual agreements and affinities to combine. The whole was simply a matter of proportion and degree. Those who did associate, whether for worship or for any other purpose, must doubtless find their individualities running together in some intellectual, moral, or practical grooves, but as far as regarded Christian unity and Christian union, it did not matter whether such associations consisted of two, or twenty, or two hundred, or two thousand individuals, if they were allowed and received as themselves constituents of a still larger association—the Church. Mr. Wicksteed then gave a most interesting account of the Church Congress which he had recently attended in Liverpool, paying a warm tribute to the spirit of nationality which had there been manifested, and the desire displayed to do good to men. The combination of the lay and clerical elements had given dignity to our old English Protestant institution. At the approaching Ecumenical Council the lay element would not be represented, and that would prove the ruin of the Roman Catholic system. He had been struck at the Congress by the extreme importance attached to the death of our Lord—not to his life, or his teaching, but to his death. This had assumed the two forms which distinguished the High Church and the Low; and one speaker, advocating the elevation of the Host, had gravely said that if you lifted up Jesus Christ every day, Christ himself had said he would draw all men up to him, and had attributed the failure of the Church to the neglect of the daily sacrifice. Unitarians knew what it was to enjoy communion with their Lord, and to feel the presence of his Holy Spirit in that service, but they differed widely from the paganism of this sacrificial doctrine. Another thing that had excited his regret was, that although many outward changes and improvements were suggested in the services, scarcely one word was said on the necessity of revising the Church’s thought. After an amusing description of Archdeacon Denison’s declaration that there were thirty-seven reasons against altering the Prayer Book, and none in favour of it, the speaker sat down amidst loud applause.

The Rev. R. A. ARMSTRONG rejoiced to stand there as a member of that association. He was grateful for the acknowledgment of his conduct of the morning’s service, and certainly not the less so that it was proffered by one whose name he had long honoured, and that he was associated with Mr. Wicksteed. He believed that organisations for purely religious purposes were of higher importance than at any time before. It had become a truism to say that this was an age of progress. Save one or two, there never had been an age of which this was more emphatically true. But the assertion was made in very different senses. Some meant by it that thoughts of God, of theology, of religion were giving place to what were thought more practical topics. Others, that there was a fresh young spirit of religion abroad. Europeans might, without great inaccuracy, be divided into four great classes. The first class would comprehend the maintainers of the old orthodoxies. For his part, whether High Church or Low, Ritualistic or Evangelical, he thought they were of one type—men of purely passive mind, who simply believed what they were taught. From them no great service to the cause of progress could be expected. (Applause.) The second class were the indifferent. When they came to church they did unmitigated evil. They were a clog on the preacher and an interruption to the congregation. The third were men of upright and noble lives, who deliberately rejected religion. They were the most earnest philanthropists of the day. It was a shame for us that, while we shook hands with those who scoffed at our religion, and often thought them good company, our liberality could not stretch to those who gravely shook their heads at it. (Applause.) But from these he expected no lasting help. It had been demonstrated again and again that nothing but religion had in it vital force, to initiate a sustained development. Therefore he looked to that fresh and thoughtful religion, at once old and new, which marked the fourth class amongst us, and which he trusted characterised the members of that association for the salvation of humanity. (Applause.)

The Rev. J. L. SHORT, in a speech which our correspondent wishes “he could reproduce word for word,” spoke to the sentiment of liberal legislation in connection with religion. He hoped that the precedent of the Irish Church Bill would not be applied to the English Church when its day should come, arguing that the abandonment of national property to a sect was altogether wrong and unfair. He was not so sure that the disestablished Church had a claim even on her private endowments. They had been bestowed on her as a national Church, representing the common belief of the people. Suppose the Ptolemaic system of astronomy had been endowed by Croesus with his wealth, would it be fair to the nation that after the discoveries of Copernicus the old system should still be taught by endowed professors? It would impose an unjust burden on the people. But he would leave the Church. It was sure to sink. He had, however, a great interest in the Universities. (Applause.) The present arrangement was one of the most intolerable positions that he could very well conceive, and could not be borne with any longer. Yet he did not hope for any great things for our denomination in the change. The old Universities had opposed every great progressive movement for the last three hundred years, and had dismissed one great man after another from their service. Not so the venerated, and ever to be venerated, New College, at York. When he remembered that its alumni had stood forward every where as founders, supporters, or developers of the liberal institutions of the country, he contemplated with dismay our young men entering our Universities, lest they should be lost in the conservatism of those schools, and our fine old Nonconformity be crushed beneath it.

The Rev. A. W. WORTHINGTON thought that the fact that Unitarian opinions were unpopular, which had been regretted by previous speakers, was in fact capable of satisfactory explanation. So soon as popular opinion overtook their point of view, the Unitarian thinkers moved on to some new out-post of advancing thought, and left their number again behind. If their number was small, and their views scantily supported, they might yet be hearty and firm in their union with each other, and he had great pleasure therefore in expressing the hearty welcome of the district, the association, and the ministers to the Rev. C. L. Whitam, whose labours in Nottingham were already reaping their full measure of success; to the Rev. R. A. Armstrong, whose services of that day had already earned their expression of gladness at his coming into the district; to the Rev. R. C. Jones, whose settlement with his father’s congregation, showed his affection for his early associates, and their respect for his father and himself; and to the Rev. George Wooller, whose speedy settlement at Newark attested the goodwill which he had conciliated to himself there.

The motion was seconded by Mr. S. BACON, and carried unanimously, and was warmly responded to by the Rev. C. L. WHITAM.

The Rev. J. FERRAR proposed and Mr. GILL seconded “the memory of the Rev. J. N. Dresser and of the Rev. Francis Bishop, who had been removed from the association by death within the year.”

Other speakers followed, among whom was the Rev. W. Mitchell, to whom the chairman expressed the regret felt at his approaching removal.

INTELLIGENCE.

MINISTERIAL APPOINTMENT.—The Rev. Philip H. Wicksteed, M.A., of Taunton, having received a most cordial and unanimous invitation from the Dukinfield congregation to become their minister, has accepted the same; but it is understood that it will be some time before Mr. Wicksteed can enter upon his new sphere of duty.

RESIGNATION.—The Rev. William Brunton has resigned the pulpit at Middlesborough, and will terminate his duties there at the end of the year.

MANCHESTER: CONFERENCE OF SUNDAY-SCHOOL TEACHERS.—On Saturday evening, upwards of 150 persons interested in Sunday-schools assembled at the Memorial Hall. After tea Dr. Marcus presided, when the Rev. H. E. Dowson, B.A., read a paper on “What is religious as distinguished from secular instruction?” He urged upon all that teaching such as we have in ordinary day-schools—reading, writing, and arithmetic—was what might be regarded as secular instruction; whereas the function of the Sunday-school should always be, and more especially when secular education was made truly national, to draw out the soul towards God our Father, leaving dogma alone, and so to make the Sunday-school the children’s church. Looking to the future, he urged that Sunday-school teachers should prepare themselves for the coming time when the children of our land would no longer be permitted to grow up in ignorance of secular knowledge, but be prepared for thorough religious culture in the Sunday-school.—The Chairman, in the main, expressed his approval of Mr. Dowson’s views, but held that even in day-schools the scholars should be led to God as the Source of all moral law.—The Rev. W. H. Herford, B.A., urged that Sunday-school teachers could better give religious lessons than lessons on secular subjects, because they involved less thought and preparation, which were essentially needed in secular teaching.—Mr. John Heys vindicated what he thought was the practical teaching-power in our Sunday-schools. Nine-tenths of it came from the working classes, who did the best they could, and willingly, and therefore he did not like to hear their efforts disparaged. As a rule, he thought that both teachers and schools should be left to themselves to judge what course was best suited to their individual circumstances.—The Rev. J. Harrop contended that religious instruction might be given even in teaching how to write a copy, and that secular and religious instruction could be blended. The Rev. T. E. Poynting said secular efforts cultivated the intellect to help a man to earn his livelihood in the commercial world, whereas religious instruction drew out the moral and spiritual aspirations of the soul, and helped man to use secular blessings in the way God desired them to be used.—The Revs. Jeffery Worthington and J. Freeston, Messrs. D. Baxter, J. Pollard, J. Pilcher, George Smith, and William Freeston also addressed the meeting, after which it was agreed, with Mr. Dowson’s consent, to print the paper which he had read to them.

LOCKE’S STATUE.

To the Editors.—The following extract from the College Calendar for the current session (p. 170) will give to you and your readers the information respecting Westmacott’s statue of Locke, which in the last number of the Herald (p. 352) you express a wish to have:

“About the year 1808 a subscription was set on foot by several admirers of John Locke, for the purpose of erecting in some public edifice a permanent memorial to his genius and virtues. They collected a sum which, with accumulations of interest, amounted at last to about £1,000, and they caused a statue of Locke to be executed in marble by the late Sir Richard Westmacott, R.A. In 1836, pursuant to a resolution passed in 1833 by a general meeting of subscribers, the statue was presented to University College by a committee appointed to carry into effect the vote of the subscribers. It was placed where it now stands, at the east end of the General Library, on the completion of that room in 1849.”—Yours faithfully,

JOHN ROBSON, Secretary.

His book is therefore constructive. The spirit and tone in which he writes is calm and even reverential, diametrically opposed to the icy coldness of Strauss."—Athenaeum.

ON THEIR OWN MERITS,

The WINES OF HUNGARY are good, useful, Wines, without forcing upon them, as has been too much the case, a reputation and character beyond their INTRINSIC QUALITIES. There is sufficient diversity of taste in a large population to ensure for the Wines a fair trial and a regular market; and it is fairer to place them well before the public, and let them stand the test of comparison with those of other countries. In the long run this will be best for the interests of the Wines themselves, as they are really good, sound Wines. Perhaps the quality most in demand, and MUCH RECOMMENDED by doctors, is

CARLOWITZ,

WHICH WE OFFER AT 2s. PER DOZEN, quality of LONDON HOUSES. We may remark that we were among the very first who brought Wines

WHAT THE CHURCHES ARE DOING.

The Rev. W. Taylor, "the California preacher," who recently visited this country as a "revivalist," has probably carried out in more literal fashion than any other Methodist preacher the theory of Wesley, "The world is my parish." He has laboured extensively in America, Africa, Great Britain, Australia, &c., and the last we hear of him is that he is about to visit India and Ceylon. Mr. Taylor chiefly defrays his own expenses by the sale of various books of which he is the author.

By order of the King of Prussia special services were to be performed in all the Evangelical churches of Prussia on Wednesday last, the anniversary of the birth of Luther.

The Synod of the Greek Catholic Bishops, which met at Damascus, has decided that the Patriarch Melchitus shall go to the Ecumenical Council at Rome with eight prelates, the others remaining at home for reasons of age or of health.

The Correspondence de Rome gives the following statistics of the Roman Catholic hierarchy, summoned to attend the Ecumenical Council:—Patriarchs, archbishops, and bishops resident in their respective sees, 776; the same "in partibus infidelium," 228; total, 904. Of these, 12 are patriarchs, 75 resident archbishops of the Latin rite, 25 resident archbishops of other rites, and 35 archbishops in partibus: 605 are resident Latin bishops, 45 are resident bishops of other rites, and 193 are bishops in partibus. Three of the prelates are 95 years of age, two 90 and upwards, and 20 octogenarians.

The Pope was presented a few days since, by Mr. D. J. Oliver, of San Francisco, with one of the most splendid specimens of silver ore ever extracted from the mines of California. It required eight soldiers to carry it up the staircase of the Vatican. It weighs 3,885 ounces, and is reckoned to be worth upwards of 5,000 dollars.

The radical movement which has for some time been taking place among European Jews has extended to America. The National Reform Convention of Jewish Rabbis in session at Philadelphia have passed resolutions in favour of adopting modern languages in the prayers, and of introducing modifications in the dietary, marital, and other laws.

The language to be used in the Ecumenical Council is Latin, and as nearly every country has its own way of pronouncing it, the Congregation of the Index has been commissioned to fix a uniform pronunciation, in order that in the diversity of accents the assembly may not degenerate into another Tower of Babel. We fancy some of the pupils will be found rather too old to be taught a new method of pronouncing their Latin, even if they have much of it left.

The Pope has sent a letter "to his holy daughter Isabella II., Queen of Spain," inviting her to attend, with her "very happy husband," and "holy children," the Ecumenical Council. This would look like bitter satire, if we did not know that "holiness" at Rome means simply allegiance to the Church.

We should have had another outcry against heresy, if Professor Maurice had been appointed to a stall at St. Paul's, as was stated would have been the case if Canon Dale had accepted the deanery of Ely. This, however, he has declined to do.

At a meeting in Dublin on Friday last the bishops of the Irish Protestant Church passed several important resolutions on the subject of "reconstruction." They "are prepared to co-operate with the laity in the formation of a committee to consider the subjects to be brought before the General Synod—as suggested at the late Lay Conference." They add that they have already taken steps to convene meetings for the election of clerical and lay delegates to that General Synod; and they, thirdly, declare their resolve that "the bishops shall sit and vote as a separate order, with the right of conference and discussion in common whenever desired by themselves or either by the other orders."

The Primate has written to the Ritual Commission, who certainly cannot be accused of over-haste, desiring them to meet at once in London, and sit from day to day till their report is finished, and stating that it must be made before Christmas. The report of the Lectionary Committee was given in last June. According to this the Lessons from the Apocrypha, which for saints' days number twenty-six, are reduced to four; but for ordinary days forty are still retained out of the one hundred and six lessons. A second series of "Lessons for Evensong on Sundays" is provided; so that they may be used either as alternative Lessons at the second service, or at the third service, if thought desirable.

Mr. Sedley Taylor, a fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge, who has just resigned his fellowship from religious scruples, writing to the Bishop of Ely, says:

"I was ordained deacon in 1862 by your predecessor, but, owing to ill health, did not proceed to priest's orders at the time, when I could have done so with a good conscience. A course of inquiry, since undertaken and carried on for several years, has led me to form convictions very seriously at variance with the formularies which bind the consciences of the English clergy. This being so, I relinquish, as far as in me lies, the ministry of the Established Church, though of course perfectly aware that, while the law remains as it is, I cannot free myself from certain disabilities attaching to the clerical office, notwithstanding the resignation of all its attendant advantages, including, in my own case, a fellowship in this college." Since his resignation, a lay fellow has likewise given up his fellowship for the same reason.

The Bishop of St. Asaph, Dr. Short, who for some time past has been unable to discharge the duties of his office, has sent in his resignation. This makes the seventh bishopric which it has fallen to Mr. Gladstone's lot to fill up within a few months, the others being Winchester, Salisbury, Oxford, Exeter, Bath and Wells, and Carlisle.

A numerous and influential meeting was held in Liverpool, on Monday, respecting the University Tests Bill, Mr. James Macrea in the chair. Mr. J. J. Stitt, in proposing a resolution in favour of the re-introduction of the bill, said it was not a Dissenters' question, but one of great national necessity, in which all ecclesiastical distinctions should be merged and sunk. The burden of the tests now applied in the universities had been felt to be intolerable, not only by Nonconformists, but by the most enlightened section of the members of the Church of England.—Mr. W. J. Lampart seconded the resolution.—The Rev. J. Kelly, Congregational minister, supported the resolution, denying that the interests of religion would suffer by the change, and citing the experience of the Scotch Universities. Mr. H. Bright (the first Liverpool Dissenter who took the degree of M.A. at Cambridge) moved that the gentlemen present form a deputation to meet Mr. Forster. He explained in detail the grievances and disabilities which the present system imposed, and the exclusion from fellowships and other college prizes which it involved.—The Rev. C. M. Birrell, Baptist, seconded the resolution; which was supported by Mr. R. Trimble, who contended that if one half of the nation were shut out from educational advantages which were intended for the whole, a national injustice and wrong was committed.—On the motion of Mr. Rathbone, M.P., seconded by Mr. George Melly, M.P., thanks were given to the chairman. At the interview which the deputation had with Mr. Forster on Tuesday, he said he was unable to state what course the Cabinet would take next session, but for his own part he altogether sympathised with the movement for the repeal of the existing restrictions at the Universities. The cause had also warm friends in the Cabinet; indeed he might say that last session Sir John Coleridge's bill was pushed on by his colleagues with as much energy as if it were in reality a Government measure.

After the morning service in St. Paul's on Tuesday, the 3rd inst., Canon Gregory expressed his sorrow at the disgraceful manner in which the services of the cathedral were usually attended by the vicars-choral and their assistants. He said that the performance of the service had become a public scandal, and that it was a question whether it should not be entirely discontinued. "On All Saints'-day, one of the greatest festivals of the Church, there were only two gentlemen present at either service, and there are only three this morning; it is really too bad; it is disgraceful." These and some other remarks were answered by one of the singing men, who said that their attendance was as regular as they had engaged to make it, and that they should be happy to attend more services if they were paid better, for the miserable stipend they at present received compelled many to seek other engagements to keep them from starving. Canon Gregory then said that the service of God and the public service were above the convenience of the individual, and that that was not the time or place to discuss the question of pay, but, he added, he would make all England ring with the story of the disgraceful performance of the services at St. Paul's; and if this, his public remonstrance, had no effect in procuring a better administration, he would invoke the power of the visitor of the cathedral.

Dr. Cumming (as he stated at a meeting held in Liverpool on Tuesday evening) is "preparing at great length" an answer to the Pope's Latin letter to himself, and he intends to give His Holiness "a spell of his mind and belief" on the doctrine of infallibility—of course, still maintaining his own.

WHAT IS SAYING ON CHURCH MATTERS.

The Civiltà Cattolica, in an article attributed to the direct inspiration of the Pope, accuses M. Maret, Bishop of Susa, of having written a work tainted with modern Liberalism, and committed the error of believing that this is reconcilable with the Church, and boldly defends the absolute monarchy of the supreme Pontiff, which M. Maret's views, it says, would reduce to a mere phantom. The said work, which is on the Council, has been seized at all the booksellers' shops in Rome.

The Pope, who is a great "joker of jokes," is reported to have likened Ritualists to bells, inasmuch as they call people to the church without entering themselves.

In some remarks on the approaching Council, the Fall Mall says:

"To us there is something striking and pathetic in the spectacle presented by the Pope and his bishops. It is like the frantic rush of all the Mrs. Partingtons in both hemispheres to order off the Atlantic Ocean under pain of every penalty which they can inflict upon it. The pathetic part of the matter is that they really believe, at least that so many of them really believe, that they really can do what they say they can do, that they do actually suppose that the winds and the sea will obey them and will be still at their command. There is, indeed, something pitiable in the straits to which they are reduced. They are obliged to affirm propositions so monstrous that every child, one would think, must be able to point out where their absurdity lies. The Pope has to declare himself infallible, and the supreme judge of truth and falsehood, good and evil, right and wrong, and at the same time to ask a Council to vote him to be infallible and omnipotent because his infallibility would not be quite infallibly sure of itself without their vote, and because his omnipotence requires some assistance. He has to declare that he is the guardian and keeper of eternal truth revealed to man by God once for all, and transmitted to him by a tradition of 1,900 years, and at the same time he is about to add to the Christian creed doctrines which notoriously did not form part of that revelation, which were never heard of for centuries after it was made, which are in themselves violently improbable, not to say impossible, and which have been specifically denied by many of the most eminent members of the body of which he is the head. All these, however, are but branches and particular applications of that one huge master fallacy which runs through and pervades every part of the whole system. When people can seriously accept the pretensions of the priest they can believe in anything. If a man can bring his mind to suppose that any one mortal man has been empowered to work invisible miracles, to forgive sins, to be the channel of exceptional favours given to individuals whereby bad people may be made good, or at all events may be treated as if they were good, he has taken leave of common sense, and has made the first step in a long line of absurdities on which he does not know where he may stop. We rejoice in the Council and in the claims on which it is based, because both one and the other show priestcraft in its true colours, and distinctly raise the issue whether after all Obi and magic are or are not the true solution of human difficulties."

In an interesting lecture at Liverpool, Dean Alford said that the great object of an ordinary Englishman's faith in our day seemed to be not so much Christ as his own Christianity—i.e., the validity of the historical and outward framework by which his faith in Christ was displayed. He much feared their faith in their Church system, in their creeds and formularies, and in the Written Word, was a more real and stronger thing than their faith in the living person of their Divine Master. He went on to show that, as God had manifested Himself in both His Word and works, it was impossible these two should ultimately be at variance, if rightly studied and understood. In this connection he thought there was much wanted an attitude of faithful courage and humble self-distrust towards scientific inquiry. For instance, in the investigation and classification of facts, if not in speculations, they should have the manliness to hail the researches of such men as Darwin and Huxley as so much solid gain in understanding nature, which was in its own degree the exponent of God. His opinion was that some of the greatest eclipses truth ever suffered had been owing to men gathering round it, instead of giving it free play and ventilation. One matter in which he thought the Christianity of the present was hardly making due preparation to be the Christianity of the future was in its treatment of Holy Scripture. Excellent as is our present version, scholars were constrained to confess that it does not now, within many degrees, represent what they know of the text and meaning of the Bible. The time, he believed, was ripe for an authorised revision. The Church of Christ ought to be put in possession of all facts as to the gospel of Christ, and not left, even on the smallest point, to fight her enemies in the dark. In conclusion, he argued that their present Christianity needed more directness, more simplicity, less subjection to the cramping of precedent, or the persistence in honoured abuses.

The Watchman says that from eight to ten thousand members are annually lost to Methodism by removals—that is to say, this number of members, on removing from one place of abode to another never again join a Wesleyan Society.

On Sunday morning, the Rev. F. D. Maurice preached an impressive farewell sermon to his congregation at St. Peter's, Vere-street, in which he vindicated the course he had pursued since he entered upon his charge there. His only object, he said, had been to represent the Almighty as the friend of all mankind and the enemy of evil. The sole message which he had sought to convey was that God was fighting for each of them against the foes which each had within him, and that, with God upon their side, if they would but trust themselves to Him, their victory was certain. He had never represented the Almighty to them as a mere sovereign power, omnipotent not only against sin but against the sinner; nor had he ever darkened His features with the clouds of wrath which too many theologians had drawn before His face. The statesman and the lawyer might have desired that he should teach such a creed as this, in the hope that by so doing he might aid the feeble efforts of the policeman and the executioner, and restrain people from evil by inspiring them with the terror of future punishments; but he had felt that it was safer and nobler to invite those around him to see God as He really is—a God of love; and this had been the only end of his preaching all the time he had been in that place.

Dr. Hanna, a minister of the Free Church of Scotland, and son-in-law of Dr. Chalmers, who has "brought himself out of the belief in denominationalism," at a public dinner in Edinburgh last Saturday, said the one thing the country has to do is "to teach the common people, and that by compulsory means, the common branches of education, and leave it to the churches of the different denominations to do as they please—and he trusts they will energetically exert themselves—as to religious education." He is perfectly satisfied that the general intelligence of the country is going along with the view that we should have "no denominational education in any form whatever."

It is almost as amusing to find the Exeter Flying Post, which quotes some remarks complimentary to the educational efforts of the clergy from the Inquirer, calling it "a Radical Dissenting organ," as it was to find this, a fortnight ago (in noticing Mr. Kenrick's "Memorials of St. Saviour-gate Chapel," which originally graced our columns), resorting to the periphrasis of "one of our periodicals," rather than condescend to name the Herald, which, for reasons of its own, the Inquirer has scrupulously avoided doing from the first. It may argue a want of grace in us, but we must admit that we have not been able to keep from smiling at this.

A correspondent calls our attention to the following display of Christian charity by one of the successors of the Apostles, the Rev. W. Keane, rector of Whitby. At a meeting for the adoption of a memorial to the Queen against the recent appointment to the see of Exeter, after quoting a passage from the Westminster Review to show that that latitudinarian organ hailed Dr. Temple's essay as an onslaught on revealed religion, he said it had also been translated into the Indian dialects for the perusal of the votaries of Hindooism, to counteract the teachings of Christianity. The appointment was as bad as that of Dr. Colenso, whom he (the Rector) knew at Cambridge as a splendid mathematician, but as a hater of religion and of good men! Mr. Keane then read some strictures which he wrote on the essay on its appearance in 1860, representing it as both blasphemous and puerile, and full of the subtlest poison for religious minds! Yet, as our correspondent remarks, the speaker was one who is in the habit of enforcing on his parishioners their duty towards their neighbours, as contained in the Catechism of his Church—that they hurt no one "by word or deed," and that they "keep their tongues from evil speaking, lying, and slandering."

The Advertiser, organ of the publicans but strictly Evangelical, in announcing that Mr. Dale declines to become Dean of Ely, thus grumbles at Mr. Gladstone's ecclesiastical appointments:

"He is a discreet man, and knows how to dispense his favours judiciously. To the High Church party or the semi-Ritualists he gives the bishoprics of Salisbury and Oxford. To the Rationalist he gives the bishopric of Exeter, and the deanery of Durham, and a canonry at Chester. He then turns to the Evangelicals, and to show his 'impartiality,' he singles out a canon, aged 73, who has already preferments of £1,937 per annum, and he offers him a deanery. The offer, as he probably expected, is declined; but Mr. Gladstone will take credit for having 'done the civil thing,' and having allotted to the Evangelicals a valuable preferment, if they had but chosen to accept it!"

As one of the deputation to the Vice-President of the Council on the University Tests Bill, Mr. W. J. Lamport, in the course of an able speech, said:

"They were most anxious to impress on Mr. Forster, and, through him, on Her Majesty's Government, that Nonconformists were not, as they had often been accused of being, indifferent to learning and science. It was very hard to see one of their own friends, like Sir Roundell Palmer, complaining that notwithstanding Nonconformists could now take their degree at Cambridge and a bachelor's degree at Oxford, and were offered the advantages of a good education at the universities, so few of them availed themselves of it. But there would continue to be very few Nonconformists who would take advantage of those privileges until the just and rightful results of a career of academical distinction were completely open to them. Until that result was achieved the number of Nonconformists going to Oxford and Cambridge would be limited, as at present, to the sons of a few rich men who could afford the time and money, and who went for the sake of the education simply, without any idea whatever of devoting their after lives to the study of learning and science. The Nonconformists were told that their ministers, in point of learning, were not up to the standard of the clergymen of the Church of England. He was not prepared to say that that was not true; but there again their opponents locked up the key of knowledge, and then complained that they did not enter in. Still, the Nonconformists had men amongst them that they could put forward on any platform with any clergyman of the Church of England."

"CROWN OF JESUS MUSIC."

We give a few more extracts from this favourite Catholic hymn-book, which will, we think, not at all astonish some of our Protestant community.

The following is an address to St. Joseph:

"Joseph our certain hope of life!
Glory of earth and heaven!
Thou pillar of the world! to thee
Be praise eternal given.

"The Lord of Lords and King of Kings,
Ruler of sky and sea,
Whom heaven and earth and hell obey,
Was subject unto thee.

"Hail! holy Joseph, hail!
Prince of the house of God!
May His best graces be
By thy sweet hands bestowed.

"Hail! holy Joseph, hail!
Prince of the house of God!
Cheer thou the hearts that faint
And guide the steps that fail."

HAIL! SOLOMON'S THRONE!

"Hail Solomon's throne!
Pure ark of the law!
Fair rainbow! and bush,
Which the Patriarch saw.
"Hail Gideon's Fleece!
Hail blossoming rod!
Samson's sweet honeycomb, Portal of God."

"Well fitting it was
That a Son so divine
Should preserve from all touch
Of original sin.

"Nor suffer by smallest
Defect to be stain'd
That Mother whom He
For Himself has ordained."

HAIL! DIAL OF ACHAY!

"Hail! dial of Achay.
On thee the true sun
Told backward the course
Which from old he had run!
"And that man might be raised,
Submitting to shame,
A little more low
Than the angels became.
"Thou, wrapt in the blaze
Of his infinite light,
Dost shine as the morn
On the confines of night."

What mean these strange ditties?

COMPLINE.

"The little office of our Blessed Lady."

"May Jesus Christ, thy Son, reconciled by Thy prayers, O Lady, convert our hearts, and turn away His anger from us. O Lady, make speed to befriend me. From the hands of the enemy mightily defend me."

"O Mother of mercy!
O Star of the wave!
O Hope of the guilty!
O Light of the grave!
Thro' thee may we come
To the haven of rest,
And see heaven's King
In the courts of the blest."

THESE PRAISES AND PRAYERS.

"These praises and prayers
I lay at thy feet,
O Virgin of virgins!
O Mary most sweet!
Be Thou my true guide
Thro' this pilgrimage here,
And stand by my side
When death draweth near."

THE IMAGE OF MARY, OUR QUEEN.

"This is the image of our Queen,
Who reigns in bliss above;
Of her who is the hope of men,
Whom men and angels love!
Most holy Mary, at thy feet
I bend a suppliant knee;
In all my joy, in all my pain,
Pray thou to God for me."

COMING COUNCILS.

A NUMBER of free-thinkers have been considering whether it might not be possible to assemble, at Paris, a philosophical congress, at a moment when the Roman Church is preparing to renew, in full council, her anathemas against the principles of modern society.

Only last year two philosophical congresses produced excellent results; one at Hamburg, composed of the disciples of Herbart; the other at Prague, convoked at the proposal of De Leonhardi. The idea is novel and excellent.

The Eastern and the Protestant communions, in answer to an appeal from Rome, have declared that they cannot unite with an assembly where the rights of all are not recognised as alike sacred. A Jewish synod has quite recently shown a wide and conciliatory spirit in relation to the feelings of the age, thus presenting a striking contrast to the tendencies of Rome.

Doubtless, very soon, an extraordinary Masonic meeting will assemble and produce a declaration of its principles, in the interests of rationalism and universal toleration. A congress of free-thinkers will also assemble at Naples during the time of the sitting of the Council, and will lay its stone towards the foundation of public liberty.

M. Henri Carle, in the Libre Conscience, insists upon the opportunity for an assembly of this nature, and proposes the meeting at Paris of a philosophical congress, in the shape of a private assembly, whose proceedings are to be made public by the press. He says: "We propose to join with these several manifestations—all unanimous for the claim of free inquiry and the inviolable respect of conscience—that of a congress of Theists, asserting the truths of natural religion and the principles of social union which proceed therefrom, among others, the affirmation of the independence and inviolability of the individual conscience. We ask all our readers to present to us their views upon this project. They will thus facilitate its realisation."

THE REFORMATION IN ITALY.

THE present eventful period in the history of the Romish Church carries us back to that all-important era when its errors began to be first perceived and its corruption execrated; and the following, abridged from the Sunday Magazine, will we think interest our readers:

According to Luther, in his days "The greater part of the clergy, especially the occupants of the cloisters, were very unlearned blockheads, some of whom could hardly read, and of those who could the most part contented themselves with babbling the words of the service without understanding them, alleging in defence that 'the Holy Ghost understood them, and Satan was scared by them.'"

Of himself he records that he was twenty years old before he had seen a Bible, or knew that there were any more of the Gospels or Epistles than are contained in the Postils. In Italy the ignorance of the clergy, like all the other discreditable characteristics of the Romish Church, manifested itself in an exaggerated form. These "Frates Ignorantiæ" made it their boast that they knew nothing, and would learn nothing.

The Church having thus gone over to the side of ignorance, there naturally emerged a state of hostility, more or less pronounced, between her adherents and those for whom culture and literature presented attractions. Indeed, from the very dawn of modern literature in Italy, a decided anti-Papal spirit manifests itself in the writings of its cultivators. Dante, Petrarch, Boccaccio, Ariosto, to say nothing of less famous names, have each, after his own fashion, indicated unmistakably the antagonism which they felt to exist between their tendencies and pursuits and the spirit, practices, and influence of the hierarchy. The language they sometimes employ in denouncing both individuals and classes passes the bounds of moderation. With Petrarch, Rome is constantly "Babilonia;" and both in his poetry and his epistles he inveighs against it and its rulers in the strongest terms. In one sonnet he speaks of having "escaped for his life from impious Babylon, whence all good is gone; hospice of evil, mother of errors." In another he denounces her as "the school of errors, temple of heresy, forge of deceit, dire prison, where the good dies and the evil is fostered and engendered; against which it will be a great wonder if Christ do not come forth in wrath."

Dante, a higher and purer spirit than Petrarch, uses language not less severe in reference to the corruptions which reigned in the Church. Addressing the Popes, some of whom he represents himself as finding in the Infernal Regions enduring the most frightful torments, he says:

"Trampling the good and raising up the bad,
Your avarice o'erwhelms the world in woe.
Your gods ye make of silver and of gold;
And wherein differ from idolaters,
Save that their god is one, yours manifold?
Oh, Constantine! what evils caused to flow,
Not thy conversion,—but those fair domains,
Thou on the first rich Father didst bestow."

Many more such passages might be culled from Dante, whose severe and lofty spirit could ill brook the levities and corruptions which characterised the court and clergy of Rome in his day, and whose intensely religious feeling led him into sympathy with doctrines which, at a later period, would have been signalled as "Protestant;" such, for instance, as the supremacy of Scripture as the final rule of faith and duty; the denial of the validity of priestly absolution; the repudiation of prayer for the dead; the upholding of Christ as the rock on which the Church is built; and the assertion that the temporal authority is not to be derived from or dependent on the spiritual. One feels grateful to hear from amidst the gloom of the sixteenth century a grand voice like that of Dante, proclaiming, in support of the doctrine of the soul's immortality, such words as these: "It is certified to us by the most true doctrine of Christ, which is the way, the truth, the life; the way, because by it we advance to the felicity of that immortality; the truth, because it suffers no error; the light, because it illuminates us in the darkness of mundane ignorance." When we consider the giant grasp which Dante laid upon the opening intelligence of Italy, we can easily believe that the bold utterances to which we have referred were not without a powerful effect in preparing for a revolt against the supremacy of the Romish See.

More antagonism to evil, however, is not always in itself positive good; and, unhappily, irreligion so prevailed throughout Italian society that rebellion against priestly domination assumed to a large extent the form of an entire renunciation of Christianity. Yet from time to time earnest spirits had arisen, who not only lifted up their voice against the prevailing corruption, but were faithful witnesses of the truth "as it is in Jesus." Even at Rome itself there were men who taught and held truths usually distinctive of Protestantism. An association was even formed, including a number of men of high position in the Church, which sought to counteract the unhallowed tendency of the tone of society under Leo the Tenth. The Reformation spread much farther in Italy than many suppose. But it was met everywhere with the violent hostility of the dominant powers; and at length the light that had been kindled was trampled out or quenched in blood, and Erebus and Night once more resumed their reign.

THE TEMPLE AGITATION.

THE Exeter See storm has nearly spent its fury, and little now remains of it save some low moanings and growls.

Dr. Pusey has evidently given up all hope of persuading Dean Boyd and the rest of the Chapter to set themselves into opposition to the law, as in a long letter on the hated appointment he never so much as mentions them; and he now turns his eyes wistfully towards the bench of bishops for help. "He cannot conceive," he says, "how it will be possible for them, without previous explanation (which Dr. Temple has refused to give), to consecrate one lying under the censure of their House of Convocation."

Archdeacon Denison expresses his conviction that it is hopeless now to resist Dr. Temple's election, but he proposes "that a great effort should be made to stay his consecration till such time as he has given public satisfaction for public offence."

The Standard, however, feels that the time for effectual resistance has passed. This should have been made before the congé d'élire was issued, and Dr. Temple became the nominee no longer of Mr. Gladstone, but of the Crown. The opportunity has been lost; and if he takes his place on the throne of Dr. Phillpotts as Bishop of Exeter, it will be due either to the cowardice, the apathy, or the narrow-mindedness and bigotry of Churchmen themselves. Never in modern times has the Church made such a confession of weakness, or exhibited such a display of impotence as in this case. It is not a question of party feeling. High Church and Low Church are equally revolted at the scandal of nominating the most distinguished of the Essayists to a bishopric. Yet with all this they cannot unite in resisting it. They hate each other so much that they cannot join hands in combating a common enemy.

This certainly has been made quite clear. As the Rev. James Skinner, a well-known Ritualist, puts it, those who are faithful sons of the Catholic Church had equally good grounds for averting Dr. Baring's or Dr. Bickersteth's consecration, as for uniting with the Evangelical party in active opposition to the consecration of Dr. Temple. "When," he says, "we have Lord Shaftesbury's associates of the 'Church Association' receiving with 'laughter' the profane blasphemy of Mr. Walker, of Bristol, that believers in the Catholic doctrine of the Blessed Eucharist are 'Theophagists,' and when there are bishops who go the length of rejecting curates from a licence who hold this part of the Catholic faith, I need hardly stop to draw comparisons between the virulence of heresies."

One or two of Dr. Pusey's statements, likewise, have been called in question. "A Hertfordshire Incumbent" shows that the condemnation of the "Essays and Reviews" by Convocation, of which so much has been made, was left incomplete. And a correspondent of the Guardian wishes to know what grounds the Doctor has for declaring that in consequence of that volume "soul after soul has been carried off in the whirlpool," and for speaking of it as having caused "the loss of human souls." "Such expressions," the correspondent justly thinks, "can only mean that the writer is definitely acquainted with many cases in which, owing to the particular cause specified by him, individual souls have been, or certainly will be, condemned in the other world;" and he asserts that "such a statement, so remarkable in all its parts for the extent of knowledge which it implies, and, if true, so exceedingly important, ought, if made at all, to be substantiated by names, dates, and circumstances." "It is a matter of more than temporary interest to learn what are the facts on which Dr. Pusey relies for so positive a declaration on so mysterious a subject, and whence he obtained his knowledge."

If, too, Dr. Temple is a heretic, the Rev. M. Mac Coll wants to know why he has "been allowed all these years, without protest, to have charge of the education of so large a portion of the youth of England. It is no part of the duty of a Prime Minister to assume the office of an ecclesiastical dictator, and pass arbitrary judgments in matters of heresy. He has a right to assume that every clergyman in the English Church, who is neither condemned nor under trial, is eligible, on the score of doctrine, to a bishopric. It is his business, as the dispenser of patronage in a national Establishment, to do justice to all parties whose position in the Church of England is fairly tenable." If Dr. Temple's position is not tenable as a Bishop, it cannot be tenable as a Priest."

Dr. Lake, the Dean of Durham, notes with satisfaction "that scarcely any eminent name, in what may be called the younger generation of English Churchmen, supports the agitation." And Dr. Ewing, the Bishop of Argyll, in a bold, outspoken letter, speaks of the heretical volume which has caused it as "an attempt to serve the best interests of revelation and morality," and is thankful that the attempt was protected by the State. "Had we," he writes, "been under the Governments of Philip II. or of the United Provinces, they would have protected the superstitions of Dr. Pusey or the artificial theology of Dr. McNeill. Happily, our Government had a more intelligent perception of truth and its duties, and prevented the fair stature of Christ from being dwarfed to the size of the one, or dislocated to the satisfaction of the other."

As Dr. Pusey does not seem likely to have much of a following in seeking to relieve the Church from "the iron hand of the State," the only result which the present agitation appears likely to have is that of leading to the abolition of the farce of the Dean and Chapter praying to be guided by the Holy Ghost in choosing a bishop, when the fact is that they have no choice whatever in the matter, but are obliged to elect the nominees of the Crown.

The Unitarian Herald.

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 12, 1869.

THE SALT OF VOLUNTARYISM IN THE ENGLISH CHURCH.

It is interesting and satisfactory to note the rapid advances made by the Irish branch of the Church, since the Act was passed which decreed its separation from the State. Every report shows it to be penetrated with unwonted excitement, and pervaded by activities as vigorous as they are new. Donations of a munificent character have assured its pecuniary means, and evinced the willingness of its wealthy members to supply, ungrudgingly, its general needs. In an earnest and resolute spirit, most creditable to the manly sense and just appreciation of their position, its laymen have claimed, and have won their right to a due share in the Councils of the Church, even to a participation in the settlement of doctrinal requirements. Some of the clergy—and of the highest rank—tried hard to maintain in lofty isolation certain special and irresponsible powers; but they failed egregiously to suppress, or even control, the new-born energy and self-reliance of the people. Accordingly, the great assemblies which hereafter are to direct the action and determine the policy of the Irish Protestant Church, will be composed jointly of laymen and priests, with voting powers duly arranged to secure a just share of influence to those for whose highest service it is that the Church exists, and whose clergy are literally their ministers.

All this should yield encouragement to the mother Church of England, in the prospect, no longer distant, of her own emancipation from the trammels of the State. Events in these days march with rapid strides. Questions of public importance are settled with comparative promptitude and facility. Railways, the telegraph, and the ablest, most enlightened and widely-diffused press which the world has ever known, scatter information broadcast over the land; penetrate every hamlet with argument and illustration; and inspire the general mind with consentaneous resolves, which quickly secure attention in the halls of legislation and the cabinets of government. The harvests of popular opinion and the nation's will ripen much faster than heretofore. Two or three years of general discussion and concentrated attention sufficed to abolish the Irish Church; and the signs of the times unmistakably denote a speedy solution of the fate of the elder branch of the Establishment.

It needs no gift of prophecy to forecast the future of the disestablished English Church. All that has been great in her history, every activity which has augmented her usefulness, and every missionary effort she has made, has been born of the spirit of voluntarism. On the side of her relations to and connection with the State, she has been cold, inert, and dead. Just to the extent to which she has thrown herself on voluntary effort has she put forth mighty energies, and seated herself in the heart of the people. The touch of the State has been paralysis; the contact of the free spirit of the dissenting churches has been life and power. To the hard and worldly tendencies of the former she must ascribe the sad and indisputable fact, that she has always been a laggard in popular movements, and in the evangelisation of the masses. It was not the influence of the State which eventually induced her to follow in the steps of Robert Raikes, and attach a Sunday-school to every church; which led her to found missions, either at home or abroad; or to establish great agencies for the diffusion of pure and religious literature. In all these things the State has been to her an incubus and a drag; and only as, by sympathy with external movements, she has emancipated herself from its icy grasp, has she widened her borders, extended her stakes, and fought, not unsuccessfully, for a share with other denominations in the affection and interest of the people at large. Like the central figure of the celebrated picture, "Mors Janua Vitæ," the Church has two distinct aspects. On the one side, is the bare attenuated outline, revealing the skeleton form of death; on the other, the lovely and attractive figure of an angelic presence, emerging into the light and glory of a higher and better existence. As the Church leans on the State, she becomes lethargic and powerless; as she throws herself on the free spirit of spontaneous sacrifice, she is vitalised and enriched with grace. Once set free from her present bonds, she will start with a bound on a new race of usefulness and influence; and possibly reacting on the Nonconformist Churches, will stimulate them to a noble rivalry. Her differing and now distracting sections, will then find, in a freer scope for their several peculiarities of discipline and doctrine, a common ground of yet greater love for her institutions, attachment to her name, and pride in her history. Their aims, instead of being divergent only, will probably become more united than ever. When the Broad Churchman can publish his opinions and advocate his theories, undeterred by legal penalties or ecclesiastical ban; when the Evangelical can hold and enforce his views without fear of persecution from a hostile Bishop; and the Ritualist can regale his eyes with gorgeous vestments and becloud himself in incense, unmindful of possible actions at law,—each will cling less pertinaciously to the special views which now ensure somewhat of the charm of persecution and martyrdom, and will rather contract than widen the lines which at present divide the Establishment into hostile camps.

Other benefits and blessings may also be anticipated, in which the religious world generally may share and rejoice with the Church. The stolid prejudices which now obstruct the path of improvement in many ways will dissolve and disappear. Liturgical revision will become possible,—a matter of interest not alone to Churchmen, but to every man who admires, though he may not use in his public services, the inspired and noble utterances of her offices and prayers. The dead-weight of authority removed from the publication of the Bible, improved translations—rejecting not a little of proved interpolation and acknowledged misrendering—will become popular, and will be used with no imputation of heterodoxy, or none that will secure a momentary regard. The universities, no longer claimed as belonging to a Church by law established, will open wide their embrace to all, irrespective of creed. Popular education, relieved from the overshadowing influence of a dominant priesthood, will seek to make instructed and intelligent citizens of all the children of the realm; whilst the voluntary and nobly emulating zeal of the different Churches will bring the saving truths of religion to their consciences and hearts. In Ireland, Protestantism has been, for the first time, placed on ground favourable for a bold and effective challenge to the Roman Church; and will engage, not without hope of success, in the struggle with the malevolent influence of Ultramontaniam, which contributes so largely to augment the evils of Ireland, if it does not even lie very close at their root.

OUR ROMAN LETTER.

ROME, NOVEMBER 4TH, 1869.

I SHOULD like to give you a little news from this place; only things are so different from all one is accustomed to see and hear that I hardly know where to begin. I suppose, however, that the Council interests you most, and that you would like to know what is said about it here. It is not easy to give much information on this point, as the Romans do not like to talk of it; partly because they are a discreet people, who try to live in peace with the ecclesiastical powers, partly because they know that whatever the Council may decide, it will not change anything in their lot, as the purpose of the Council is principally to fortify, in the rest of the Catholic world, the authority of the Pope and the uniformity of ecclesiastical discipline. They assure me here that Cardinal Antonelli was not favourable to the plan of holding it, but was overruled, and consoles himself with the certainty of a great majority for the Papal propositions. But it seems to me that therein lies precisely the danger, because this facility of getting voted any decree they like will lead to proposals which may endanger the Church, in overstepping what the liberal and educated Catholics and what the Governments can bear.

These propositions are elaborated in congregations of theologians, each presided over by a cardinal; they are said to comprise 600 questions, which are to be freely discussed by as many bishops in Latin. But how many of the bishops will be able to speak intelligible Latin, and how many to understand the pronunciation of a French or English speaker? And then all the Latin in the world would not be sufficient to carry on a real debate on things actual and living. You may easily get up a Latin declamation, or put together the terms of a decree, but a parliamentary discussion is quite a different affair. The result must be that every article which is not adopted by acclamation will be sent to a committee, named by the Council, and the politic art will, of course, find play in the choice of these committees. The common belief is that there will be very little opposition, even to very extravagant propositions—as, for instance, the personal infallibility of the Pope.

However cautiously the propositions may be worded, they can be nothing but an improved and enlarged edition of the Syllabus. This will displease many learned and sincere Catholics; it will widen the gulf between the Church and those who are not wholly accustomed to look upon Church and Religion as one and the same; but will these dissentients be earnest enough to favour a schism? I do not believe it. Will a new Gallican Church arise, or a national Patriarchate be formed in Germany? Nothing as yet leads me to conclude that such things are possible. A movement of this kind could only take rise in the Church itself, among ecclesiastics; but although I know full well that there is discontent in the minds of many of these, one does not see the man who could originate so great a change, and find a sufficient clerical and laical following. My own impression is that the Council will weaken the Church, and help to undermine it, but not that it will endanger it directly and immediately.

It will certainly, however, offend and disgust many Governments, because it will interfere in the matter of education and of mixed marriages, and they will be driven to resist these attacks, by the introduction of civil marriages, non-confessional schools, and other measures directed against the danger of clerical oppression of their subjects. This will be a long, and in some countries an arduous fight, but one which must end in the defeat of Roman pretensions.

Several points in regard to the Council are not yet decided; for instance, whether bishops in partibus are to have a vote or only a right to speak, and whether representatives sent by bishops who cannot attend in person are to be admitted. There are many other difficulties of a more material kind; such as how to find room inside St. Peter's for the assembly, its committees, and all sorts of wants of so numerous a body; how to assign decent lodgings to so many men of high rank, and very often insufficient means, bringing with them the theologians, chaplains, and servants. Many are provided for in monasteries; some of the Roman princes have offered to take in to their palaces one or two bishops each; not a few have hired houses or flats at their own expense; but a great number must depend on the Pope for lodging and food, which is a rather awkward circumstance for the independence of their votes.

I have talked with several bishops, who all say that they have found the Pope full of health, good humour, and hope, and very happy to see the representation of the whole Catholic world assembled around him. He is very busy with all the arrangements, and, as he is extremely fond of ceremonies, he is quite in his element. I saw him yesterday in the Sixtine Chapel when the "dies iræ" was sung, and could observe him well during this long high mass. He is a strong, hale old man, of tall stature, and with a very good voice, which filled the chapel when he pronounced the benediction. His countenance is good-natured; his smile has a touch of slyness in it; he is very witty, and the town is full of his bon mots; but he is not a man of talent and mind. His health is much better than it was some years ago. He drove to-day in great state to the Church of S. Carlo; the space in front of it was filled with a dense mass of people, who cheered him, but not very loudly, and some ladies waved their handkerchiefs. The lower classes are afraid of him, as they believe that he has the "evil eye."

I have been very much struck with the theatrical aspect of these great Papal ceremonies, and how little they are fitted to produce a religious or solemn feeling. In the Sixtine Chapel, the Pope sat on a high throne, under a baldachin, with a silver mitre on his head, and covered with heavily-embroidered vestments, looking very much like a half-barbarian oriental king in an opera. The cardinals sit round him in an enclosure, in their red clothing, and at the feet of each, on a lower bench, a chaplain in purple; behind them, and facing the Pope, are two long benches for the bishops, the senator, and distinguished strangers, who must be in dress coats; the ladies, in black and wearing veils, have seats further off. The Swiss guards, with their quaint uniform, the beautiful middle-age court dress of the Roman nobles—all give one more the impression that one is looking at an old picture, than that one is joining in a religious act. The singing is beautiful; it is without any instrumental accompaniment; but the nature of this heathenish soprano choir is blamed here even by the clergy, and this hideous monstrosity will certainly be abolished. The chapel itself is not fit for a church; it might as well be a room for an exposition of pictures, or a lecture room. The altar is simply placed against the straight wall, which is covered with Michael Angelo's "Last Judgment," and the Pope's baldachin is put as awkwardly on the side wall. The place was evidently not built for a chapel, and the service there is nothing but an exhibition of Papal pomp for strangers.

AMERICAN NOTES.

It is stated that the oldest clergyman in America is the Rev. Mr. Richardson, of Washington, Ohio. Although he is 106 years of age, he walks five miles on Sundays and preaches a sermon.

Brigham Young has been delivering an address to the female portion of the congregation assembled in the new tabernacle at Salt Lake City, urging them to abandon the foolish habits and customs of Babylon, and to stop sending to New York for the latest patterns and fashion plates. Fashion, however, is likely to be stronger than the prophet, whose authority seems to be somewhat on the wane.

The Nation thinks that probably the happiest man in Europe to-day is the Pope. He believes in himself with a fervour and confidence which the rest of the higher clergy can hardly be supposed to feel; and this, and his ignorance of the world and its ways—or, in other words, of the condition of European society—prevent him from seeing any of the difficulties and dangers to the Church by which other minds are troubled. The pantheists, and materialists, and rationalists, who are alarming ecclesiastics of less simplicity, are to him so many corpora vilia on which the Church is to exhibit its power; and with them, as with the renegade Governments, he is said to believe the Council completely sufficient to deal. He has, in the plenitude of his good humour, even replied to Dr. Cumming, the great Protestant bore, and graciously informs him that the heretics will be allowed to come in and submit themselves at the Council, but not to argue; and the doctor is apparently nearly as much pleased by being answered at all as if he were in the fourth hour of his refutation of Popish doctrine before the Council itself.

According to a custom which is becoming disagreeably common with our American cousins, before Father Hyacinthe had landed from the vessel which conveyed him across the Atlantic, he was "interviewed" by a reporter for the New York Times, who furnishes us with this description of him:

"Pausing to survey the man whose name has been borne on the wings of fame to the remotest bounds of Christendom, we could not help being amazed at the calm simplicity of his exterior. He is below the middle height, stout, stoops a little, has grey hair, dark eyes, and a round face. At a distance there is nothing striking in his appearance, but the moment you come in contact with him you feel an indescribable charm coming over you, and when he speaks his soft, earnest voice completes the fascination, and you are completely won. Immediately you realise that this is no ordinary man, but one whose mental powers are marvellously developed. He is gentlemanly and affable without the beau ideal of refinement. Approaching him, we took advantage of a pause in his reading to introduce ourself, and to make known the object of our visit. He very politely accorded us a brief interview, during which he told us that he was in excellent health, and, apart from a little fatigue, felt not a whit the worse for his journey. He came to America for the purpose of learning more of the people and studying their institutions. He informed us that he purposed sojourning among us for two months at least."

Shortly after landing, he was "interviewed" also by the reporter of the New York World, and when the interesting stranger had remarked that several religious edifices were visible from the window of his room, the following conversation ensued:

Reporter: Well, monsieur, do you think you are likely to preach to us in any one of them?—Father H.: Oh, no; I shall not preach. I desire to avoid everything like notoriety or publicity. I wish quietly to observe your country. I wish to study the social, political, and religious condition of your people. I wish also to study the language. I desire to make no public appearance whatever.

And what are we to consider your relations with the Roman Catholic Church, monsieur? Have you broken with the Church?—No; I have broken with abuses, but I have not broken with the Church. I shall remain a Catholic all my life.

And in regard to the excommunication?—I stand simply on the defensive in regard to that matter. I can do nothing else at present. But there are friends who will defend my action. I am a Catholic, and intend to remain one.

But not a monk?—No.

There is undoubtedly a considerable amount of sympathy with your course on the part of the French clergy. Do you think there are any aspirations for a national Gallican Church; I mean a separate Church?—Oh, not at all. The French clergy are opposed to the infallibility of the Pope.

And the bodily assumption of the Virgin, monsieur?—Yes, to both of these dogmas; but they are also anxious to maintain the unity of the Church.

Then a separate national Church is not aimed at by the French clergy?—By no means. The Gallican Church does not desire to be separate. She desires unity. You see what Protestantism has led to! All these divisions! Ah, that is a warning to her! And yet I recognise the grace of the religion of Christ in all Churches that maintain his worship.

But these abuses, monsieur, that you speak of; we who are outside do not see how you can consistently speak of abuses. We understand that the whole body of dogma of the Roman Catholic Church is considered a body of infallible teaching; what room is there, then, for abuses? It is to stultify oneself to say that abuses and infallibility can exist side by side.—The fact that Councils have been called to reform the Church is sufficient to dispel that idea. Along with infallibility of teaching there may be errors in practice; even irregularity of conduct. But these are matters that we cannot now discuss.

At all events, monsieur, anything looking to reform does not seem to enter into the theory of the coming Ecumenical Council. There is no such thing as reformation talked of; but only an attempt at heaping up more dogma.—Perhaps without success. However, I have little hope of the Council. Everything seems to have been settled, in an Ultramontane sense, beforehand.

Reporter (rising): I think, monsieur, I have troubled you long enough.—Father H.: Oh, non, non. I was pleased to see you.

You think we shall never be able to claim you as a Protestant?—Non, monsieur (smiling). I remain Catholic all my life. I do not resist the Church, but I resist tyranny; I resist oppression. That is the position I take. Adieu (shaking hands), adieu! I shall be pleased to see you again. Au revoir.

The Nation thinks, and very justly, that the best thing his admirers can do for the Father is to offer up fervent prayers that all ministers of all denominations, including the "Evangelical clergy of Boston," and all proprietors and publishers of newspapers, and all politicians, "prominent citizens," and "advanced thinkers," may be filled with sufficient grace to let him alone; to refrain from giving him, or causing or procuring to be given him, public "receptions," including brass-bands and refreshments; to refrain from pressing him to deliver lectures, discourses, or sermons, for the purpose of widening the breach between him and his Church, and from hanging round his bedroom door, or looking in at the keyhole, or soliciting his autograph. And the reason is this—that if Father Hyacinthe gave himself up to these injudicious worthies, and did their bidding, his influence, which is now great, would vanish like a mist; all the mind of the world—and the world is still governed by mind—would desert and repudiate him as a blatherskite, a voice and nothing more; and there would be an end of him.

On Sunday fortnight, the Father excited no little sensation by his presence in Ward Beecher's church at Brooklyn. The Herald informs us that, after the service, "the two great pulpit orators shook hands, and the reception on the part of the Rev. Mr. Beecher was apparently very cordial, Mr. Beecher saying that he cordially welcomed Père Hyacinthe, not because he was a curiosity, but because he had asserted his independence."

The Rev. C. H. Brigham, who has been visiting Salt Lake City, and made the acquaintance of most of the Mormon leaders, says the place is Paradise, but the system is Perdition. He found a number of Unitarians there, who are anxious for a church of their own.

The Liberal Christian says:

"Chicago is soon to have a fourth Unitarian society, and is more of a Unitarian city than New York. If Boston is the Jerusalem of our faith, Chicago is the New Jerusalem."

The New York Tribune, mentioning that Mr. Titus Salt has been made a baronet, observes that he is said to be a lineal descendant of Lot's wife. This must be taken, we suppose, cum grano salis.

Fanny Fern (sister of the late N. P. Willis, and wife of Mr. James Parton, the biographer and essayist), in an article on "Sunday" in a New York paper, thus describes the kind of sermon she wants:

"I want a human sermon. I don't care what Melchisedek, or Zerubbabel, or Keren-happuch did ages ago; I want to know what I am to do, and I want somebody besides a theological bookworm to tell me—somebody who is sometimes tempted and tried, and is not too dignified to own it; somebody like me, who is always sinning and repenting; somebody who is glad and sorry, and cries and laughs, and eats and drinks, and wants to fight when they are trodden on—and don't! That's the minister for me. I don't want a spiritual abstraction, with stony eyes and petrified fingers, and no blood to battle with. What credit is it to him to be proper? How can he understand me? Were there only such ministers in the pulpit I wouldn't go to church either, because my impatient feet would only beat a tattoo on the pew floor till service was over; but, thank God, there are; and while they preach I shall go to hear them, and come home better and happier for having done it."

LITERARIA.

The native papers of Calcutta are loud in their praises of a work by a Hindoo lady, named Koilashasini Devi, who is a member of the new and spreading sect of the Brama-Somaj. The book is called "Visheva Shobdha;" and, in accordance with that title, it contains, in prose and verse, "of very tender and beautiful character," praises of the Creator, and meditations upon the loveliness and the destinies of the animated world.

Professor Döllinger, of Munich, has in the press a new work on the Religious Sects of the Middle Ages, a subject which in his hands can hardly fail to be made interesting.

Professor Lipsius, of Kiel, announces a work on the chronology of the Roman bishops during the three first centuries.

Bunyan's "Pilgrim's Progress" has been translated into the Chinese language, and, in answer to an appeal made a short time since, means have been provided for printing it.

Dr. Frederick H. Hedge, of Brooklyn, Massachusetts, has published an interesting series of discourses, with the title "The Primeval World of Hebrew Tradition," treating the various questions that are raised by the first chapters of the book of Genesis in connection with modern science. They deal with such subjects as the creation of the world—when, how, what from, and for what purpose; the origin of the human species, the development theory, and the divine sonship and brotherhood of man; the brute creation; man in Paradise, or the beginning and end of human society; Paradise lost, or the theory of evil; Cain, or property and strife as agents of civilisation; nine hundred and sixty-nine years, or patriarchal and human longevity.

The Rev. Henry Giles, whom some of our readers will remember as minister of Toxteth Park Chapel, Liverpool, has just published a volume of "Lectures and Essays," the former of which have been delivered with great acceptance before various institutions in the States, and contain much interesting and valuable information and reflection upon Irish history and character.

Mr. Macgregor, of Rob Roy canoe celebrity, has a work in the press giving an account of his wanderings on the Abana, the Pharpar, and the Jordan.

Mr. E. Wortley-Montagu, whose autobiography has been announced as about to be published, was in the brief space of forty-two years, a Westminster boy, a sweep, a Spanish muleteer, a student, an author, a Protestant, a Papist, and finally a Mahometan.

A book has just been published by Longmans, entitled the "Great Epoch," from which we learn that the "millennium commenced with the confinement and restraint of the Dragon's power and influence in 1866." We knew that the kingdom of God "cometh not with observation," but it argues great blindness on our part not to have seen at all that "a time of blessedness has arrived" such as is understood by the millennium. This, however, may be urged in our behalf, that by a slightly different manipulation the figures indicate 1873 as the time when millennial blessedness is to begin.

One of the most beautiful gift-books for the coming season will be "Shakespeare and the Emblem Writers," by our friend the Rev. Henry Green, of Knutsford. It is illustrated by nearly 250 woodcuts and photolith plates, and presents a great variety of curious information which cannot but be interesting to every student and lover of our great poet.

The Charlemagne Bible, about which the French papers are inquiring, bears no proofs of its being what it is called. M. de Speyr-Passavant, failing to obtain 60,000 francs for it abroad, was glad to take £750 for it from the trustees of the British Museum, where it now is. Mr. H. Shaw, in his "Handbook of the Art of Illumination," allows that Alcuin produced a copy of the Bible for Charlemagne; but he believes that the MS., so-called, purchased for the nation, is not older than the time of Charles le Chauve, or the latter part of the ninth century.

FRENCH SECULARISM.

(From Le Protestant Libéral.)

THE irreligious movement which commenced in France some years ago becomes daily of greater importance. There is being formed at the present time a Civil Society of Families independent of all External Religion (de toute pratique religieuse), which recalls the societies of the Solidaires in Belgium.

The following are the terms in which the founders of this society explain the work which they desire to carry out, and the end which they propose to attain:

"The principal cause of the perpetuity of theological forms, even when belief exists no longer in the mind of the individual, lies in their organisations of charity.

"The principal cause of the smallness of the number of freethinkers who succeed in bringing all the acts of private life into perfect accordance with their philosophical convictions is the absence of effective association.

"The existing laws authorise societies for mutual assistance among citizens of the same state, the same county, or the same religion. Would they forbid a society for mutual assistance among persons independent of all external religion?"

"On the contrary, it seems to us—and to this we call the attention of lawyers—that even in France nothing hinders freethinkers from the practice of fraternity among themselves, and from organising for further usefulness a society for mutual assistance in case of sickness, accident, loss of work, and for the adoption of orphans, the assistance of widows, &c.

"We publicly invite citizens, who, like ourselves, believe in the possibility of such a society for the mutual help of independent thinkers, to send a written assurance of their approval to the office of La Démocratie, 39, Rue Rochecouart, Paris.

"The emancipation of the human mind will be complete when all have come to act exactly as they think."

Twenty-one names are appended to this manifesto. Several detailed declarations of sympathy have been received, both from Paris and from the provinces, by the originators of this society.

It is interesting to see by what spirit these declarations are dictated. That which we subjoin shows fairly the general tendency of the supporters; it bears many signatures:

"The undersigned, considering that all religions have the same object—domination; and that all their leaders use the same means for its attainment—ignorance, fanaticism, and consequently superstition, the results of doctrines more or less mysterious, but always incomprehensible;

"That the influence of religious idolatry has, among other results, that of destroying all that is best and greatest in the mind of man; that this influence especially affects woman;

"That it has become necessary to protect as soon as possible from the fatal errors of the religious sects the wife and mother—that first teacher of the child;

"That we have no right to warp from the cradle the mind of the child, who in after years will reproach us for so doing, should his mind, more developed than ours, allow him to see the absurdity of the principles which we imposed on him before he could judge them;

"That the ministers of all sects are by destiny the tools of despotism, and that on referring to history, as the Catholic inquisition has produced the Massacre of St. Bartholomew, the Dragonnades, &c.—the English Protestant Church has incessantly martyred Catholic Ireland for centuries;

"On these grounds declare for the support of the Civil Society of Families Independent of External Religion."

Certainly, nothing is more touching than the idea which has inspired the founders of this union. They wish to fight against "ignorance, fanaticism, absurdity." This is admirable. But what a confusion of ideas! What ignorance of history! What misuse of violent expressions! Is there not an extreme simplicity in supposing "that all religions have the same object," and that that aim is none other than the degradation of mankind? Again, to say "that the ministers of all modes of worship are by destiny the tools of despotism," is surely to use words without understanding their meaning! Lastly, is there not some novelty in stating "that as the Catholic inquisition has caused the massacre of St. Bartholomew, the Dragonnades (!), the English Protestant Church has incessantly martyred Catholic Ireland for centuries?"

But this extravagance of language, this ignorance of history is here of only secondary importance. What is really worthy of note, is the feeling which impels so large a number of our contemporaries to revolt against the observances of religion. This is one of the most exalted and noble sentiments; it is the love of justice, the hatred of intolerance and superstition. It is because a deplorable confusion has been made between wicked and cruel deeds which have proclaimed themselves as an expression of religion, and the principle of religion itself, that this war against all religion has been declared. Christianity thus bears the burden of all the pharisaisms which have seized upon its name and placed themselves under its protection.

This confusion will endure until we arrive at a full knowledge of the religion which we wish to defend and to see triumphant; until the words of a confession of faith or a syllabus cease to be regarded as an echo of the Sermon on the Mount. But when truth stands clearly revealed by history, when each can assure himself that true Christianity, the Christianity of Jesus, far from destroying our love of right, liberty, and justice, exalts and strengthens it—on that day, religion—though its triumph will not be complete, for other and more powerful causes delay it—will at least no longer be opposed by the honest and manly consciences which combat it to-day because they fancy it productive of "intolerance and absurdity."

FIRESIDE READINGS.

MY CHILD.

BY JOHN PIERPONT.

I CANNOT make him dead!
His fair sunshiny head
Is ever bounding round my study chair;
Yet, when my eyes, now dim
With tears, I turn to him,
The vision vanishes—he is not there!
I walk my parlour floor,
And, through my open door,
I hear a footfall on the chamber stair;
I'm stepping toward the hall
To give the boy a call;
And then bethink me that—he is not there!
I thread the crowded street;
A satchelled lad I meet,
With the same beaming eye and coloured hair;
And as he's running by,
Follow him with my eye,
Scarcely believing that—he is not there!
I know his face is hid
Under the coffin lid;
Closed are his eyes; cold is his forehead fair;
My hand that marble felt;
O'er it in prayer I kneel;
Yet my heart whispers that—he is not there!
I cannot make him dead!
When passing by the bed,
So long watched over with parental care,
My spirit and my eye
Seek him inquiringly,
Before the thought comes that—he is not there!
When at the cool, gray break
Of day from sleep I wake,
With my first breathing of the morning air
My soul goes up, with joy,
To Him who gave my boy;
Then comes the sad thought that—he is not there!
When at the day's calm close,
Before we seek repose,
I'm with his mother, offering up our prayer,
Whate'er I may be saying,
I am in spirit praying
For our boy's spirit, though—he is not there!

Not there! Where, then, is he?
The form I used to see
Was but the raiment that he used to wear.
The grave, that now doth press
Upon that cast-off dress,
Is but his wardrobe locked—he is not there!
He lives! In all the past
He lives; nor, to the last,
Of seeing him again will I despair;
In dreams I see him now;
And, on his angel brow,
I see it written, "Thou shalt see me there!"
Yes, we all live to God!
Father, Thy chastening rod
So help us, Thine afflicted ones, to bear,
That, in the spirit land,
Meeting at Thy right hand,
'Twill be our heaven to find that—he is there!

IN the Count de Paris's recently published work on the "Trade Unions of England," we meet with the following striking narrative in the chapter on the coal trade:

"In reading their evidence before the Royal Commission it is impossible not to feel admiration and sympathy for the determined hardy men bred by this life of toil, privation, and risk. We have hitherto refrained, as a rule, from mentioning individuals, confining our attention to the more general features of the subject in hand; but it would be conveying a very imperfect idea of the influence of trade unions and of the future before them, if we omitted to notice some of their leading men, who are an honour to the cause which they represent. One of these, Mr. McDonald, told the story of his life with striking simplicity. He was born in Scotland forty years ago, and at the age of eight began to work in an iron mine. He was obliged, summer and winter, to get up at two o'clock in the morning, and never returned home till seven o'clock the following evening. For sixteen or seventeen hours he was employed in pushing along trucks in galleries often only eighteen inches high, and so badly ventilated, and charged to such a degree with carbonic acid gas, that three or four lamps placed close together did not afford sufficient light for loading the ore. Not one of the twenty children, who were McDonald's companions in the mine, lived to grow up. In the second mine in which he worked there were thirty boys and a good many girls. All these, with the exception of himself and his brother, died quite young, broken down by hard work, and extinguished, like one of their own wretched lamps, by the poisonous atmosphere. Nevertheless, so great was his desire to obtain higher pay and an improved position, that, in spite of these terrible trials, and almost before he had fairly attained manhood, McDonald devoted himself to miner's work in its most laborious form. He undertook by contract to construct the galleries by tunnelling through the rock (called running a level) in places where he had to work up to his knees in water, and with the moisture from the walls incessantly dripping upon him. He says himself 'In the morning when I entered, the first thing that I always did was to roll myself all over right in the water, and wet every part of the body, for the express purpose that the water falling from the roof should not create the very unpleasant sensation which water does to one who has gone recently from his bed into the mine that is wet.' The toilsome life he led did not prevent him from attending the night school which had been recently set up for the benefit of the workmen. Having saved a little money by the time he was one-and-twenty, he resolved on dividing his time; during the summer he continued to work with his hands, in the winter he went to the University of Glasgow, where he studied Greek, Latin, rhetoric and mathematics; the six months spent thus cost him about £60. At last, after having been foreman of a mine, he dropped the pickaxe and mattock to become secretary of an union. The confidence placed in him by all his fellow-workmen has since called him to the position he now occupies,—that of President of the National Association of Miners, a vast society which embraces all the pitmen's unions in the three kingdoms."

In conjunction with this it may not inappropriately be mentioned that Secretary Rawlins, who was the faithful coadjutor of General Grant during the American war, and whose death, at the age of 38, recently excited such regret throughout the States, was the son of parents in the very poorest condition in Illinois, and was at school for only eight months in his life. Up to the age of twenty-two he worked at his father's trade of a charcoal burner, but subsequently went to the bar. He had at one time almost decided to become a Methodist minister.

YOUTHFUL INDULGENCE.

ON this subject Ward Beecher well says: "Men are accustomed to look upon the excesses of youth as something that belongs to that time. Men say that of course the young, like colts unbridled, will disport themselves. There is no harm in colts disporting themselves, but a colt never gets drunk. I do not object to any amount of gaiety or vivacity that lies within bounds of reason or of health, but I do object and abhor, as worthy to be stigmatised as dishonourable and unmanly, every such course in youth as takes away strength, vigour, and purity from old age. I do not believe any man should take the candle of his old age and light it by the vices of his youth. Every man that transcend's nature's laws in youth is taking beforehand those treasures that are stored up for his old age; it is taking the food that should have been his sustenance in old age and exhausting it in riotous living in his youth."

A MEMORIAL OF WAR.

MR. HARLAND COULTAS, in some "Botanical Wanderings in the United States," has the following, dated "June 10, Liberty, Virginia." "This morning sitting in the parlour I ventured to ask Mr. Curtiss why he did not have replaced a broken pane in the window. I had noticed this ugly fracture for some time, and its continuance seemed very unaccountable, especially as the furniture and all the surroundings of the homestead were in such excellent good taste. The reply of Mr. Curtiss was quite characteristic. 'Sir,' said he, 'I keep that pane broken as an historical reminiscence of the late war. There are about fifteen bullet perforations in this house. A rifle ball passed through that window and is now lodged here—going to the window opposite and pointing to its woodwork. 'You notice there is another mark below the window, and now, sir, if you will step to the front door—here you see three more have passed through this door. The fact is, this house occupied an intermediate position between the Union and Confederate forces; the former fired from the top of yonder hill, the latter from the woods at the back of this farm, and the balls from the rifles passed through the house and left these perforations in its windows and woodwork. There are similar marks in the rooms upstairs.' It was a beautiful calm Sunday morning, and the sun shone brightly on the landscape, over which a Sabbath quiescence appeared to be diffused; but for the evidence before me, it would have been difficult to believe that this house had witnessed such dark and murderous strife between brothers speaking the same language and professing the same faith, and that the tranquillity which now reigned far and wide over this lovely vale had ever been disturbed by the booming of cannon or the crack of the rifle."

SPIDER FARMS.

THE Gentlemen's Magazine asks, if the silkworm disease should assume a serious phase, would it or would it not be worth while to try what could be done towards rearing spiders for their fibrous product? Spider's silk is a wonderful and beautiful material: when woven it gives a fabric that is described as spun gold; and its strength is prodigious. An inch bar of iron will sustain a weight of twenty-eight tons, while it is computed that a cable of spider thread one inch in diameter would carry seventy-four tons. A spider can yield a hundred and fifty yards of silk at a spinning—half the length given by a silkworm. But the worm only gives its quantum once, whereas the spider will repeat its yield at intervals of two or three days for a month or more. When allowances are made for the difference of thickness and weight of the two threads, it is reckoned, by an American naturalist, that a spider silk dress would cost two and a quarter times as much as one of worm silk. This is according to American prices for ordinary silk, and these are high compared to ours. The drawback is that the spider does not wind its thread; the insect has to be impaled, and the delicate filament reeled from it. However, this does not appear to be at all a difficult operation, only several threads have to be drawn and wound together, as one alone will not stand the strain. The spiders can be bred in vast numbers, if proper precautions are taken to prevent the old females eating their consorts, and the young ones devouring one another—two unpleasant habits peculiar to arachnid families. One cocoon will contain from five hundred to a thousand eggs, all of which will hatch; the insects are reared on wire frames and fed on drops of blood, crushed flies, bugs, or any other insects. The rearing frames are placed in trays of water to prevent the spiders straying. Perhaps some country gentleman in want of a novel occupation will set up a spider farm, and give his experience to the world. He might come to be monumented as a benefactor to mankind.

A STRANGE QUARTERING OF ARMS.

THE following pasquinade is from the pen of an American poet and artist, on hearing of the new carpet presented to the Pope by the King of Prussia:

"The Hohenzollern arms enwoven there
With Mastai-Peretti's." Outs and ins
Of heretic-Papal stitches! tell us where
The Arms of Nazareth. How St. Satan grins!

GAMESTERS' SUPERSTITION.

WE remember once watching with some curiosity one of the players at the roulette table at Baden, who, every time before staking his money, tossed up a five-franc piece for his guidance; and though two times out of three it led him wrong, such was the strength of his superstition, that his faith in it still seemed unshaken. A correspondent of the Pall Mall gives two curious instances of like credulity which came under his notice at Saxon les Bains, in Switzerland. He says, "A study of any gambling room might discomfit optimists who base their hopes on the reasonableness of mankind. 'I was sent this bill to-day,' said a player in my hearing. 'It is dated the twelfth, and is for twelve pairs of gloves. I will play twelve and twenty-four.' Here was the extremity of superstition, unaccountable if we were not something else besides being rational creatures. An hour at Monaco or Homburg might convince the most sanguine how little common sense has to do with life, and how inefficient it is to combat credulity." The development of this round a gaming table "may suggest that doubt is the generator of superstition, and exactly as we become hopeless of certain results do we rush into unreasonable credulities. The sketch of a day at Saxon hardly warrants me in preaching a sermon, but as I looked on at the sharp-witted men there who had fallen into such unreason, I was reminded of the imminent dangers of that reaction towards superstition which is probable now that the formulas clung to by Europeans seem one by one to be losing their hold. What credulities will replace the creeds we are breaking up? for just in proportion as doubt becomes systematised will credulities become necessary. What effect will our new superstitions, or rather our revived superstitions, have on manners? 'How old are you?' asked a player of a young girl standing near him. He played on the number she mentioned and lost. 'That was not your true age,' he muttered, with a sufficiently savage glance at her—for the charities of life do not thrive in company with credulities. His superstition had been stronger than his faith in a fellow creature's honesty."

INTELLIGENCE.

ACCRINGTON.—On Saturday last, a meeting was held to welcome the Rev. William Mitchell as the resident minister. The Rev. J. W. Rodgers, of Burnley, presided; and there were present the Revs. Jeffery Worthington, of Bolton, and R. H. Cotton, of Padiham, and friends from Burnley, Padiham, Rawtenstall, and Newchurch, all of whom joined in offering a cordial welcome to Mr. Mitchell. Mr. Mills, on behalf of the congregation, gave Mr. Mitchell a hearty welcome, and spoke with an encouraging faith of their future success. Mr. Mitchell, in the course of an interesting address, spoke of the Lancashire people as being straightforward, plain to be understood, &c., and he trusted that by the co-operation and assistance of the congregation the day would not be far distant when the chapel would be too small.

AINSWORTH.—The teachers and elder scholars on Saturday last held their social gathering, an annual one, originated about ten years ago by one of the superintendents with the hope of diffusing a brotherly feeling among the teachers. In the course of the evening a handsome lever watch was presented to Mr. John Spencer, who had long worked in their midst. The Rev. J. Whitehead accompanied the presentation at an address, pointing out the zeal and self-sacrificing spirit with which Mr. Spencer had laboured amongst them as a teacher and superintendent for more than twenty years. Mr. Spencer thankfully acknowledged the gift. The meeting closed with the national anthem.

CIRENCESTER.—On Tuesday last, at the marriage of Miss Clark to the Rev. W. S. Smith of Tavistock, the general esteem which she had secured was pleasingly shown. Though heavy rain was falling, the chapel was filled with well-wishers, and a number of girls belonging to the Sunday-school (in which Miss Clark had been a most kind and efficient teacher) dressed in white, met her at the entrance into the chapel, and strewed flowers on her way. At the close of the ceremony, a number of the members of the congregation assembled in the vestry, and the Rev. H. Austin, on their behalf, presented the bride with part of a handsome tea-service, as a mark of the affectionate regard in which she was held.

FOREST HILL.—A social meeting was held last Monday evening in the little chapel, which was well filled, and an agreeable evening passed with music and addresses, the speakers expressing their faith that though located in a Primitive building, yet, like the early disciples, "with perseverance, a greater future would dawn upon them."

LEICESTER: FREE CHRISTIAN CHURCH.—The members and friends of this church held a tea-meeting on Tuesday evening, Nov. 2, on the occasion of the Rev. Wm. Mitchell's departure for Accrington. After tea many friends expressed their high appreciation of the zeal and ability with which he had laboured during his three years' residence in Leicester; and Mr. F. T. Mott, on the part of the congregation, presented him with a testimonial, consisting of several handsomely-bound books and a purse of money. Mr. Mitchell feelingly responded, strongly urging the congregation to hold together in unity and to persevere in the work of building up a flourishing Free Church. The secretary announced that for the present the services would be conducted chiefly by members of the congregation. A cordial vote of thanks was passed to the guarantee committee, who had so liberally contributed towards the maintenance of the church during the past three years. The gentlemen referred to responded, expressing their unabated interest in the success of the movement.

MANCHESTER: LOWER MOSLEY-STREET SCHOOLS.—On Monday evening, the half-yearly meeting of the Congregational Society was held in conjunction with the parents' party. The Rev. Jas. Drummond, B.A., occupied the chair. The meeting had a peculiar interest as being the last of this kind that he could attend as minister. A large number of parents and members of the society were present, in testimony of the high esteem and affection they felt for Mr. Drummond. In his address, he spoke of the religious education of children. He looked forward to the time when the Sunday-school would only be required to impart religious instruction, and the home to give moral and religious impressions. In alluding to the work of the Congregational Society, he said the tract distribution had been arranged so that house-to-house visitation of certain streets would be secured. The Revs. Joseph Freeston and W. H. Herford, B.A., and Messrs. George Smith and R. Wade likewise addressed the meeting.

NEWCHURCH.—On Sunday evening, November 7th, a tea party was held in the schoolroom, when about two hundred of the congregation were present. After tea a meeting was held, and a testimonial presented by Messrs. A. Law and Maden Clegg to the Rev. J. K. Smith, consisting of a dressing-case, together with an address expressive of the esteem in which he is held by the congregation. Several friends in connection with the place expressed their regret that circumstances should have necessitated his removal to Flowerly Field, and spoke of his labours as being conciliatory, amiable, and Christian in character.

STROUD, GLOUCESTERSHIRE.—The Rev. H. Austin, of Cirencester, delivered a lecture on November 4th, in the Corn Hall, on "The Unity and Fatherhood of God." The Stroud Journal says there were "a numerous and intelligent audience, who listened with great attention. The discussion which followed was conducted in the best temper and spirit throughout." The chief difficulty in the way of commencing Sunday services at Stroud is that the Corn Hall, and all suitable buildings yet discovered, are closed to them on that day.

The Committee of the above Chapel have determined to supply the want, which has long been felt, of greater accommodation for their Sunday-schools, and of a room suitable for congregational purposes, meetings, and lectures.
For this purpose upwards of £200 has been raised by the congregation, and another £100 is required that the new building may be opened free from debt in April, 1870.
The Committee now confidently appeal to the Unitarian public to assist them in raising this sum.
Subscriptions will be thankfully received and duly acknowledged by the Secretary.

ON THEIR OWN MERITS,

The WINES OF HUNGARY are good, useful, Wines, without forcing upon them, as has been too much the case, a reputation and character beyond their intrinsic qualities. There is sufficient diversity of taste in a large population to ensure for the Wines a fair trial and a regular market; and it is fairer to place them well before the public, and let them stand the test of comparison with those of other countries. In the long run this will be best for the interests of the Wines themselves, as they are really good, sound Wines. Perhaps the quality most in demand, and MUCH RECOMMENDED by doctors, is

CARLOWITZ,

WHICH WE OFFER AT 23s. PER DOZEN, and ask comparison with the HIGHEST PRICED quality of LONDON HOUSES. We may remark that we were among the VERY FIRST who brought Wines from Hungary seven years ago.

WHAT THE CHURCHES ARE DOING.

The Brahmo Somaj has now a "temple" at Calcutta, of which the use on Sundays is thus described in a circular:—"Hymns, 6½-7; Morning Prayer, 7-10; Prayer and Meditation, 12-1; Readings, 1-2; Conversation, 1-4; Hymns, 5-7; Evening Prayer, 7-10." There is a "ladies' gallery," this sect having adopted the separation of the sexes just at the time when the Armenians are beginning to relax it. The northern gallery contains the choir and harmonium. The example set by the opening of this temple at Calcutta will be followed by the many groups of Brahmos scattered throughout Lower Bengal.

Letters from Florence report that it was commonly asserted there that the Archbishop of Pisa had forbidden the Royal confessor to give absolution to the King of Italy unless the latter should first make a full and formal retraction of all that he had done or permitted against the interests of the Church. The condition was flatly refused, and after some negotiation was withdrawn, and the sacrament was administered.

The Pope, who finds a harmless pleasure in making saints, has ordered "acts" to be prepared for the canonization of Eugenius III. and Urban V. Eugenius is the Pope to whom St. Bernard, in the twelfth century, addressed his famous treatise, "De Consideratione," in which he advised the renouncement of the temporal power. He died in 1153, and is buried in the vaults of the Vatican. As soon as the process is taken out for the canonization, the tomb will be opened, and the faithful will be admitted to adore his remains. Urban V. was one of the Avignon Popes, and, though he made a flying visit to Rome, passed his pontificate under theegis and on the soil of France, dying in 1370.

The Holy Father is in expectation of a visit from his "holy daughter," Queen Isabella of Spain, who proposes to attend the Council. Both his Holiness and Cardinal Antonelli are much disturbed at the prospect, feeling it will be impossible to deny the fallen monarch the honours paid to a sovereign, and fearing this may lead to complications with the de facto Government of Spain, which has been more prompt in the payment of the Spanish subsidy than that of the Queen was in a position to be.

Mr. Peabody was a Congregationalist, and on the occasion of his visit to his native town, Danvers in August last, he joined in the communion of the church, assembling in the beautiful edifice built by him in memory of his mother, by whose side he is to lie. On Sunday last, reference was made to his death by the Rev. Newman Hall and other ministers of that denomination. The Bishop of London also preached a funeral sermon for him, in which he said, the name of many a man who filled a page in our country's history, or who was illustrious in literature, science or art, was inscribed on the monuments around them, but there was the name of no man inscribed there who was more remarkable for his munificence to mankind than Mr. George Peabody. He had entered on his rest from his labours—labours not for himself only, but for others and for God. His work was to acquire wealth, his delight was to expend it for the good of others. Henceforth the name of George Peabody would be the common property of both the land of his birth and that of his adopted home—another strand in that great bond of unity which draws together the people of two nations having a common origin, language, and laws, and in whose union and peaceful progress side by side in the work of civilisation and social improvement was involved the true welfare, not of themselves only, but of the entire world.

A splendid new church has been built for Dr. Candlish in Edinburgh, at an expense, including the site, of £31,000. This is another proof to the many we have lately had of what voluntarism can do.

Dr. Parker, late of Manchester, now minister of the Poultry Chapel, London, has the following strange and somewhat pretentious note appended to a recently-published discourse:

"As an arrangement for self-protection, I am driven to announce the following as my charges for general public services; in all cases travelling expenses must, of course, be paid:—Preaching on behalf of the salaries of poor ministers, nothing; preaching for ministers whose salaries are less than £100 a-year, nothing; preaching at the opening of chapels, six volumes of standard literature; attending tea-meetings, £50; going to bazaars, a hundred guineas; serving on committees, £2,000."

Some of the Devonshire clergy, apparently not able to answer or to silence them, seem to think Dissenters may be starved into submission. At a meeting at Torquay of the Church Institution, one reverend "regretted to say it, but it was a fact, that the Dissenters had most of the trade amongst them, and the wealthy Churchmen patronised them to the exclusion of those who belonged to their own Church." The ladies, he continued, were the worst offenders, "because they went to any shop that suited their fancy, without first ascertaining whether the person with whom they were about to deal was a Churchman or a Dissenter." Without this aid, he said, Dissenters would not be as powerful as they were; and he asked, "if an invading army were to appear in Torquay, would any one think of supplying the enemy with provisions and the munitions of war?"—with more of the same sort. Another speaker called attention to the fact that Devon and Cornwall furnished £192 a-year to the Liberation Society, while they sent but £39 to the Church Institution. He, too, supported the proposal that Episcopalians should avoid Dissenting shops; though he had grace enough to admit "it would be very painful to adopt such weapons."

Statistics given by the Liberator are dead against State extension of Episcopacy in the West. In regard to Wales and Cornwall, the census of 1851 showed that only about one-fourth of the attendants at public worship belonged to the Established Church; and that Dissenters provided sufficient accommodation for all the worshipping population; for the principal figures are—out of 1,104 places of worship the Church provided only 265. The Church provided accommodation for 28 per cent. of the population; Dissent for 50 per cent. At the most numerously-attended service on the census Sunday, the Church had 44,919 persons, Dissent 116,650. Out of a population of 400,000, the Church has probably not 100,000 adherents. Then, as to the cost of this minority, the net annual value of such livings as can be ascertained from the clergy list is £63,289; including parsonage houses and every thing, the annual value is computed by the Liberator at £88,000. This gives the income of the Church as about £1 per head for all the members of its communion—man, woman, and child—which is about the same as it was in Ireland. The inference is obvious.

The death is announced of the Rev. Wm. Harness, Prebendary of St. Paul's. Mr. Harness, who was in his eightieth year, was on a visit to his former curate, the Dean of Battle, and in descending a stone staircase fell, and died almost instantaneously. He was a schoolfellow, and afterwards an intimate friend, of Lord Byron. He was for many years incumbent of Regent-square Chapel, St. Pancras; and afterwards of All Saints', Knightsbridge, towards the rebuilding of which he was the principal contributor. He had ceased to preach during the last three years. Mr. Harness was not unknown in the field of literature. His edition of "Shakspeare" was well received and has become scarce; and he was at different periods a contributor to the Quarterly, to Fraser's and Blackwood's Magazines. His last undertaking was writing the introduction to the "Life of Mary Russell Mitford," which he just lived to see published.

The late Bishop Phillpotts gave to the county of Cornwall an important and valuable theological library. It was given on condition that within three years of his demise a room suitable for its reception should be provided. A large and handsome structure is now being erected at Truro, and is intended as a memorial to the deceased bishop. It will be used as a depository for the Christian Knowledge Society, as well as for purposes of the library.

The Government has signified its readiness to comply with the request of Bishop Wordsworth for the appointment of a suffragan bishop for the extensive diocese of Lincoln. This is a measure which requires no new legislation, but may be effected at once by means of a statute already in force. The suffragan, of course, will not be entitled to a seat in the House of Lords. It does not appear whence his stipend is to come; but this probably will be a matter of private arrangement, as in the case of a curate.

WHAT IS SAYING ON CHURCH MATTERS.

The Pope has addressed a letter to Dr. Manning, to explain that, though no place can be given in the approaching Council for any defence of errors that have been condemned, yet he does not wish to leave no way open to "non-Catholics" of making known the difficulties which keep them separated from the Catholic Church. His Holiness says:—"So far are we, the Vicar upon earth, although unworthily, of him who came to save that which was lost, from repelling them in any way whatever, that we even go forth to meet them, and nothing do we seek for with a more ardent wish than to be able to stretch out our arms with a father's love to any one who shall return to us. And never, certainly, have we wished to impose silence upon those who, misled by their education, and believing their opinions to be right, think that their dissent from us rests upon strong arguments which they would wish to be examined by wise and prudent men. For, although this cannot be done in the Council, there will not be wanting learned divines, appointed by ourselves, to whom they may open their minds, and may with confidence make known the reasons of their own belief; so that even out of the contest of a discussion, undertaken solely with a desire of finding out the truth, they may receive a more abundant light to guide them to it." His Holiness, of course, never for a moment supposes that these same "learned divines," in the course of such a discussion as he alludes to, can receive any "light to guide them" towards the truth. It is evidently to be conducted on the principle of "heads I win, tails you lose."

Pio Nono's last is this. On being told the circumstances connected with Dr. Temple's appointment to the see of Exeter, he said: "This Temple will soon destroy all that remains of the old Temple."

Well may orthodoxy feel alarmed when, in a paper read at a meeting of the office-bearers of the English (Scotch) Presbyterian Church in and around London, the Rev. Mr. Murray ventured to suggest, and with general approval, the expediency of shortening the Confession of Faith, the principal standard of all the Presbyterian churches in all parts of the world! There were, he said, parts of that document which, however suitable for the times in which the Westminster divines lived, were not now required. These should, he suggested, be omitted. Were this done laymen would be more ready to subscribe it, and would intelligently do so.

A correspondent of the Guardian, after mentioning that the Anglican communion in Scotland consists of about 50,000 souls, and is ministered to by 173 priests, and is governed by no less than seven bishops, asks:

"Is it reasonable to suppose that out of a body of clergy only thirty in number, one can often be found who would make a good bishop? Is it reasonable to expect that out of a body which numbers only 173, there can be supplied seven men who could, even respectably, fill the episcopal office? Experience has proved that such expectations are utterly unreasonable."

In an address delivered in Glasgow recently, the Rev. Sir Henry Moncrieff, Moderator of the Free Church of Scotland, dwelt on the important place which the lay element had ever borne in the Presbyterian Church, contrasting with it the different ideas entertained in the English Church. He scouted the notion that the clergy were a distinct order of men in the Church of Christ, and while referring to the change for the better which had come over the Irish Episcopal Church through its disestablishment as to the position and functions of the laity, and expressing his gratification on this account, said that their old conceptions were still hampering them, an illustration of which he cited from the plan proposed of making the clergy and laity vote as separate orders. This would, however, in his opinion, work its own cure; for the Irish Episcopalians would, in time, discover that this mode of voting on difficult questions was beset with perils, and was not adapted for securing a cordial, liberal, and growing support from the members of the Church towards its various schemes.

From the cries which come from all sections of the clergy of the Establishment, it would appear to be in a very bad way. Dr. Pusey thinks there is little hope for it unless it can be relieved from the "iron hand of the State." Dr. Thirlwall, Bishop of St. David's, says it seems to him impossible to doubt the impending disruption of the Church into two or three distinct parties from the internal conflicts which are taking place within it. And the Rev. J. C. Ryle, a leading member of the Evangelical School, gives a list of dangers to which his Church is exposed that is truly formidable. It is in danger from the Church of Rome; from the English and Scottish Dissenters; from the alarming progress of infidelity; from the wide-spread alienation of the working classes in large towns; from the evident political tendencies of leading statesmen; from its own internal divisions; from the growing indifference and disgust of scores of its best members in the upper and middle classes; and from the utter want of organisation to enable them to act on any emergency, in which last particular it is completely unlike most other Churches. "The Church of England alone, like a huge stranded whale, lies helpless and shiftless, and its parochial clergy are practically like the ministers of Independent congregations." All this calls for immediate reform; and he suggests a few remedies which scarcely seem powerful enough to go to the root of the evil.

The Bishop of Oxford's farewell visitation charge was shorter than usual and more to the point. In protesting against narrowness and bigotry, he said that, putting all questions of master truths aside, there is large room for difference of tone and feeling, and the mode of expressing the common faith, amongst those who hold earnestly the same Word of God, the same traditions of creed, and the same definiteness of articles. The temper of one man's mind led him to apprehend most readily, and to embody most completely, one aspect of mighty, far-reaching, many-sided dogma, that leavened all his being and teaching; and it was well that that should be so. Instead of divergency of opinion in the Church being an evil, it was a sign of life, and he would no more make every voice in a diocese speak in the same tone than he would abolish the music of nature by requiring the same note from every songster. To a certain extent the rule of liberty as to thought must be extended to the rule of observance. Feeling that strongly, few things had grieved him more than the recent controversy in the Church respecting dresses and externals. With the mighty work we have to do—with the growing masses on every side, it was heart-breaking to see the zeal of earnest spirits diverted from their true mission, and miserably wasted on unmeaning contests as to the cut of a surplice or the colour of a stole. In such a strife both sides appeared to him to be in the wrong, because both exalted things comparatively indifferent into an utterly undue importance. It was hard to understand the religion which consisted on one side in refusing to wear a surplice, and on the other in convulsing a parish by introducing into its services the startling novelty of a gorgeous vestment. To the Romanisers the bishop said there was one change which he viewed with great apprehension, and that was the tendency manifested in certain quarters to change the idea of the Holy Eucharist from a communion of the faithful into a function of the celebrating priest. The presence of the people and the actual communion were bound indissolubly together. The solitary mass of Rome was so absolutely unwarranted a deviation that we were not certain that it did not altogether overthrow the very nature of the sacrament. It was certain that the practice was most intimately connected, both as to cause and consequence, with the greatest practical corruptions of the Papal Communion.

If we do not take care, our Dissenting utterances in favour of the separation of Church and State will sound tame and poor compared with those of members of the Establishment. For instance, in a sermon at St. Lawrence's, Southampton, the other day, the Rev. J. Slater, after sketching the mode of procedure in electing a bishop, and pointing out how full it was of strange anomalies, went on to say, they would ask, "Wherein lies the remedy?" He answered at once he could see no other, and he wished no other, than the severance of the Church from the State. If they wished to heal the waters of a river, they must heal the fountain first. If they wished to undo the train of evils that are now dragging their unclean length across the face of the Church, they must heal not those evils themselves, but the source whence they sprung; and he had no hesitation in saying that one and all of these, from the appointment of bishops to the last blunder of the law courts, were the result of State patronage and State pressure. He had no hesitation, therefore, in urging upon them the necessity, nay the duty, of using every lawful endeavour to break this yoke from their necks. It might be said, What were they to do without their endowments? The matter was not worth thinking about. Let their endowments, their possessions, their position, go to the winds. The Church, when its home was in deserts and caves of the earth, was stronger and richer than when it was enthroned in the palace of the Cæsars. And so would it be again. An Established Church was a sham, a snare, a delusion; a Disestablished Church would be a spiritual power. Anyhow, their concern was not with those things, their concern was not with earthly riches, but with Christian souls. Their banner was purity; their watchword reality, and truth at any price.

Mr. Spurgeon, in addressing his congregation last week on the Mission of the Church, and particularly that of the Church of England, uttered some good plain truths in a forcible and telling manner. He said:

"When Christ's Church understood her work she would perceive that she was not here to gather to herself wealth or honour, or to seek any temporal aggrandisement and position; she was here unselfishly to live, and if need be unselfishly to die, for the deliverance of the lost sheep, the salvation of lost men. Did anyone imagine that churches were made to maintain ministers or clergymen? Did they conceive that the Church existed in this land merely that so much salary might be given to bishops and deans, and prebends and curates and rectors, and he knew not what. It were well that the whole thing were abolished, if that were its only aim. The aim of the Church of England was not to provide out-door relief to the sons of the nobility. Now-a-days, when they had not brains enough to win anyhow else their livelihood, they were stuck into family livings. Nor were churches of any class made that men of ready speech might stand up on Sundays and talk, and so win daily bread from their admirers. Nay, there was another end and aim apart from this. These places of worship were not built that the various congregations might sit comfortably and hear something that should make them pass away their Sundays with pleasure. A Church in London which did not do good in the slums, and dens, and kennels of London, was a Church which had no reason to justify its longer existing. A Church which did not exist to reclaim heathenism, to fight with evil, to destroy error, to put down falsehood—a Church which did not exist to take the side of the poor, to denounce injustice, and to hold up righteousness, was a Church which had no right to be. Let her have her bishops and her preachers, and let them be supported; let all things be done decently and in order; but let the end be looked to—the conversion of the wandering, the teaching of the ignorant, the help of the poor, the maintenance of the right, and the pulling down of the wrong."

The Freeman says sharply, but truly:

"Anglican Tractarianism died on the bosom of Rome when Dr. Newman yielded himself to the latter as to a mother. The Tractarians would have a supremacy, and, bad as is Rome's title to this, it is, at least, superior in its claims to that of the English Crown. They took the consequences, and revolted from the ecclesiastical headship of the temporal sovereign. The Ritualist is incapable of so high a flight as the Tractarian. He creeps after the Romanist as a mere imitator. If he adopts Romish doctrine it is not from conviction or knowledge, but only as a copyist. His highest ambition is to produce a plaster cast of the Italian original. The Romanist by his ritual symbolises doctrines which we hold to be absurdly unscriptural. The Ritualist symbolises nothing. He does not hold the doctrines; he does not understand them. We say that the Romish ritual is a substitute for truth, though regarded by devout Romanists as its representative. The Ritualism of the Anglican is a sham of a sham."

The light in which he is viewed by the real Romanist may be seen in a few remarks which are culled from an article in our Catholic contemporary, The Month. The great ambition of the Ritualist is to repeat the Anglican communion service in such a way, to surround it with such ceremonies and observances, as may render it undistinguishable from the Catholic mass. Nothing gives him so much pleasure as to hear that some unfortunate Catholic has wandered by chance into St. Alban's, Holborn, and has thought that he was in a Catholic church. When the Ritualist clergyman travels on the continent, one of his objects in frequenting Catholic worship is to perfect himself in Catholic practices; but he never thoroughly succeeds; he is never quite at home in the meaning of the various bells, or in the proper manner of crossing himself at the gospel; and he can never quite get rid of the custom, enjoined by Queen Elizabeth, of saying a little preliminary prayer on first entering the church; but still he might be mistaken for a Catholic by a superficial observer. And when he returns to England he carries with him some implement or other of Catholic ceremonial, wherewith to adorn his services at home—a processional cross, or some new candlesticks, or a banner of his patron saint. We cannot help remarking in the Ritualistic party the almost entire absence of any men of intellectual force. With one or two exceptions, their leaders are rather "notorious" than distinguished; their names are known to the public for their eccentricities, or their ingenuity in imitating Catholic services, rather than for any mental vigour or power of influencing mankind. This is especially noticeable at Oxford. Among the leading men there is not one who is in any sense a Ritualist, among college tutors scarcely one, although several of them, especially in Conservative colleges, still cling to the old orthodox Anglicanism. And if Ritualism still prevails to a considerable extent among the junior members of the university, it is an article foreign to the soil, imported in general from the influences of home or of school, and prone to wither and die before they attain to their degree.

We have frequently wondered what were the duties of the Public Orator at Cambridge. A wit there, during the recent election, being asked the question, replied, "To serve out butter in a lordly dish."

In the weekly travels which we have to take through orthodox papers, we very often come upon things which are startling, to say the least, to human reason. In a copy of verses in last week's Guardian, for instance, we have this strange combination of ideas:

"O for that spirit now!
Incarnate Patience, meek, Almighty, God
Of God beloved, yet taught beneath the rod
To Heaven's decree Thy human will to bow!"

SHORT REVIEWS.

Scenes from the Life of Jesus. By S. Greg. Second Edition. Edinburgh: Edmonston and Douglas, 1869.

We have been prevented from giving a welcome to a second edition of this excellent little work much longer than we could have wished. It is now fourteen years since it was first published, and having proved its usefulness, our wonder is that another edition has not been called for much sooner than it has. In the present it is considerably enlarged, and in some respects improved, several chapters having been re-written, and two new ones added. So many of our readers must be already acquainted with the book, that we feel there is no occasion for us to give anything like a critical notice of it. To those who have not yet met with it, we may just say that the "Scenes" are judiciously chosen for the purpose which the writer had in view, clearly conceived, and often beautifully described. We are sometimes asked to recommend books for young people that are suitable for Sunday reading; we can without hesitation recommend this, as helping to make more real and life-like scenes and events that often through familiarity lose something of their freshness and power, and as calculated by the spirit which breathes throughout it to cherish a loving sympathy with the holiest and best of our race. It is well fitted to follow Mrs. Greg's "Little Walter," and seems to us no unworthy companion to it; and those who are familiar with that admirable work will feel that this is no slight praise.

A Hand-book for Teachers of Infant Schools. By the editor of "Holy Thoughts." Manchester: John Heywood. London: Simpkin, Marshall, and Co.

To those who are acquainted with "Holy Thoughts," and other publications of the same authoress, we need hardly say that this Hand-book is marked by judgment and taste. It has been altogether a labour of love. Not content with simply establishing an infant school, she gave to the management of it what many are least of all disposed to give, time and thought, and was anxious to render it as efficient for its purpose as she could. With this view she procured many books intended as guides to the teachers of such schools; but "she almost invariably found that, though each contained much that was valuable, there was also much that was not at all suited to such young children—many things much too difficult for them, and many perfectly useless." In one, for instance, "a whole page was taken up with all the names for the Devil, which the children were to learn by heart." In the Hand-book which she has been at the pains of drawing up, "her great object has been to make the whole system of teaching as simple as possible, and to recommend no rules, or modes of teaching, which she has not tested." The result, we can honestly say, is the production of the best work of the sort which we have seen; and we feel convinced that not only those who are engaged in the special kind of teaching for which it is designed, but mothers also, and others that have "little ones" under their charge, will find it a valuable help in making instruction pleasant, while at the same time it is systematic and conducive to mental and moral development.

THIS is a brief, but interesting, biographical sketch of one who was most widely known and respected throughout our denomination, and whose death called forth such universal expressions of regret. It supplies some particulars which serve to fill up Mr. Higginson's excellent memoir, and adds another testimony to those which had been previously given, of the untiring zeal and energy with which our friend devoted his talents to the promotion of what he firmly believed to be the cause of Christ, and which he truly and ardently loved.

THE Rev. Benjamin Glover, who has rendered good service at Crewe in recommending our views of Christian truth, has just published four tracts with the same object. They are entitled, The Claims of Religion—a Secular Sermon; Human Nature; Thoughts on the Doctrine of Eternal Punishment; and, What do Unitarian Christians Believe? Though short, they contain good matter, much to the point, and are well fitted for circulation among those, a very large number yet, who do not know what Unitarianism means.

THE TEMPLE BAR REMOVED.

THE opposition to Dr. Temple, as from the first we said it would, has ended in nothing. Yesterday week the ceremony of electing him, if electing it can be called, was gone through. Nineteen members of the Chapter were present, of whom thirteen voted for the bishop-designate. In the minority there was no one of any mark. It consisted of Bishop Trower (only a colonial bishop), Archdeacon Freeman (who "hates newspapers," and believes if there had been any in St. Paul's time, "he also would have hated them"), Canon Lee, and three obscure Prebendaries. The Dean, Mr. Mackarness (bishop-designate of Oxford), Chancellor Harington, Canon Cook (editor of the Speaker's Commentary), and Archdeacons Woollcombe, Downall, and Phillpotts (a son of the late bishop) recorded their votes for Dr. Temple.

The Chapter having thus signally failed them, it is reported that the Cockspur-street committee, of which Dr. Pusey is one, now intend to oppose the confirmation of the bishop-elect, and according to the John Bull they have decided to take counsel's opinion as to the mode of proceeding. This, of course, will do nobody any harm but themselves. It is understood that the Archbishop of Canterbury, and the Bishops of Winchester, Worcester, and St. David's, with perhaps the Bishop of Argyll, to whose bold defence of Dr. Temple we referred last week, are ready to consecrate him.

When that has been done, we shall be curious to see whether the doughty Archdeacon of Taunton, who, according to himself, "says what he means and means what he says," will carry out his late threat, and go in with Dr. Pusey for the separation of Church and State. Many of the clergy have been made to see that if they will have the advantages of an Establishment, they must likewise put up with its disadvantages, and to ask whether the latter do not outweigh the former. They have been so long pampered and favoured that it will probably take some time for them to come to the full recognition of the truth that this is really the case; but if they look simply to the interests of religion, we have no doubt that they will in the end.

INDIAN METHODISTS.

A CORRESPONDENT of the Methodist Recorder describes a camp-meeting which he attended, in August, at Parry's Sound, on the north shore of the Georgian Bay on Lake Huron—at present on the very outskirts of civilisation. The meeting was held in a scene which wonderfully combined the wild, the romantic, and the lovely; on the margin of a bay, unsurpassed in beauty perhaps by any on the continent of America, in a kind of natural amphitheatre, among the rocks which rise from 100 to 150 feet above the level of the encampment, with the unbroken primeval forest rising in dark masses around. It was presided over by the chairman of the district, who was assisted by a strong staff of ministerial and lay labourers, some of whom had come a considerable distance. There were probably five hundred persons in all present, nearly one-half of whom were Indians. The services were held in both the English and Ojibway language. The English sermon was generally followed by an address or sermon in the Ojibway; and when the first sermon was in Indian, an address was usually delivered in English; after which the Indians and whites departed and held their prayer-meeting, each by themselves. I have seen many prayer-meetings, but I doubt whether I ever witnessed such evident displays of the power of God as among those poor Indians. There was a quietness, a seriousness, a reverence, and a propriety about all their movements which was very impressive. The penitents were placed in the centre of the group, the others gathered closely round them. Two or three of the aged men, thoroughly patriarchal in appearance, stood in the midst of the multitude, or rather bent over them, while with tearful eyes and tones of uncommon tenderness they exhorted and encouraged them. Then commenced the agony of prayer; and it was in the most literal sense of the term an agony. Nothing but the Spirit of God could have taught them to pray as they prayed. There was not one careless person in the group—not one that did not appear to be thoroughly in earnest. There was very little noise—none in fact but that which was inevitable—the natural and appropriate expression of emotion too intense to be concealed.

Among the Indians present was a small band of pagans with their chief at their head. The chief was a very fine specimen of this particular type of humanity. He was scarcely above medium height, but straight as a reed; his dark olive face did not betray the slightest indication of the admixture of Caucasian blood; and everything in his manners, and even his dress, indicated that he was proud of the race to which he belonged, and coveted no higher honour than to be known as an Indian chief. His wardrobe, it is true, differed very materially from that of his savage fathers, but on the other hand it differed enough from that of the white man to protect him from the suspicion that he had any desire to adopt his fashions. He wore a neat felt hat ornamented with a black ostrich's feather, a black broadcloth coat, a striped muslin shirt, which hung down loosely to his knees, scarlet pantaloons, and leggings which extended from the ankle to the knee, elaborately ornamented with beads. He is said to be deeply learned in the legends and traditions of his people; he understands and respects the faith of his fathers; and he rejects Christianity on the very same ground upon which so many have rejected it before him; "if it be true, what has become of our fathers?" He and his people attended all the public services, and appeared to pay marked attention to all that was said; but they withdrew from the prayer-meetings, and kept at a respectful distance when the Lord's Supper was being celebrated. At these times it was impossible for any one to fail to perceive the great difference between their appearance and that of their Christian brethren. Paganism degrades, Christianity elevates.

FATHER HYACINTHE'S FALL.

THE clerical press of the continent is never very scrupulous as to modes and means when it wishes to expose its enemies or victims to the hatred of its readers. Father Hyacinthe has by this time experienced a good deal of its temper. Among the various accusations heaped upon him the most frequent is that of having been "in league" with the Protestants; his co-religionists cannot forget that once he was (oh, horror!) complimented by Pastor Martin Paschoud. This is what one of them says of it:

"Can you find words too severe to condemn the speech of a preacher of Notre Dame who, in addressing the Peace Congress, could utter such a sentence as this: 'Three religions find a home in the civilised world—the Jewish, Catholic, and Protestant!' He puts the Catholic religion second—Christ between two thieves!"

"Do you not shudder when you hear the congratulations addressed to the same speaker by the Lutheran minister, Martin Paschoud? Amazed at the indifference and unheard-of tolerance of the servant of S. Theresa, he stuns him with this compliment: 'I am not certain whether I am a Catholic; still less certain am I whether you are not a Protestant.' And the monk bowed him thanks with a smile."

"On that day, Reverend Father, your guardian angel veiled his face and wept for you."

Poor Father Hyacinthe!

HOMES v. ASYLUMS FOR ORPHANS.

AMIDST the ecclesiastical agitations of the present time and the variety of social questions struggling for settlement, it is not easy to obtain much consideration for such a subject as the education of destitute orphan children. And yet this is part of a great subject. It goes to the very root of the mass-tendency in modern philanthropy—the tendency to believe in doing good only by large, showy institutions. And as the class to which we have specially referred are emphatically "the children of the State"—completely in its hands to mould and fashion—the question how best to train them for their place and work in life is one not merely of thoughtful interest but of public importance.

The system at present in vogue for the training of the orphan children of society is that of aggregating them in schools or asylums and educating them wholesale. The more fortunate are massed together in huge orphanages, the less fortunate in great workhouse schools. That this state of things has arisen from the best motives no one can doubt. Orphanages like that of Mr. MULLER, if mistakes, are the mistakes of a noble zeal, and the institution by the new Poor Law of workhouse orphan schools was a natural reaction from the undoubted abuses of the previous system of farming out or even of compulsory billeting of children upon unwilling ratepayers. But in either case the training lacks every element of home life, and it is doubtful whether any advantage can compensate for this defect.

With regard to the orphan-training in workhouses, the experience of thirty years has shown that the system of herding children together, which cuts them off from any experience of the family relation, with the monotonous life and strict repressive discipline of the workhouse, has a most deadening effect upon their nature, and renders them but an easier prey to the corrupting influence of the very worst families that are constantly passing through the workhouses, from whose children many of them derive their chief impressions of the world without. The depressing influences of workhouse life are such, as, in spite of superior school instruction, to make them stupid, awkward, and when sent out incapable of work, and to render the temptations to which their new life exposes them far more dangerous than they would be to children naturally brought up. The result commonly is harshness on the part of their employers, frequently ending, as to girls, in their return once or twice to the workhouse; so that it is rarely that these girls become fit for anything but household drudges, and sooner or later many find their way on to the streets. And though the case as to boys is not quite so bad, since the situations to which they are sent are commonly more permanent—and, as a fact, Parliamentary returns show that the proportion of workhouse boys who fall into crime is smaller than that of girls—yet the same thing is essentially true.

A like evil effect is found to attach in a scarcely less degree to children brought up at a heavy cost in orphanages where every attention is paid to moral training. Dr. LAURIE, one of Her MAJESTY'S Inspectors of Schools, in a late report on some of the Edinburgh orphanages (called hospitals), speaks very strongly as to the deadening influences of these institutions on the mental and moral qualities of the children. It appears that large numbers of the hospital-bred orphans break down when sent out into the world; they have had no experience of family disciplines; they are unable to face the difficulties of their position, and they finally become workhouse inmates.

It has been from practical experience of these things that a different system is now coming into notice. So dissatisfied were the authorities of the city parish of Edinburgh with the results of the training in their orphan hospital, that about twenty years ago they broke up the school and placed the children in families. This plan has since been followed in all the larger parishes of Scotland, and more recently in a few English unions, among which it is now rapidly spreading.

This system of "boarding out" is sometimes confounded with the old system of "farming out;" but the difference is radical. The idea of the old system was simply to minimise the expense to the parish of the children's maintenance, at whatever cost to their welfare or their lives; the idea of the present system is to secure the welfare of the children, as resulting ultimately in the truest economy to the community. Under the old system the children were farmed out in batches to the lowest bidder, and suffered to die off wholesale; under the present system the children are placed in separate homes, and their maintenance, on the usual scale of cottagers' children, including schooling and clothing, is provided by the guardians. The parents with whom they are boarded are carefully chosen, so as to exclude any merely mercenary motive in their taking charge of the children, and a careful and constant superintendence of these is kept up.

And now as to the practical results of this experiment. They have been most remarkable. On fair terms there has been no lack of applicants for the young orphan children, and there is no room for doubt that they usually meet with homes. Mr. GEORGE GREIG, inspector of the poor for the city parish of Edinburgh, reports "that while the children come to regard their foster parents and to be regarded by them very much like their own children, it is a very rare thing for a child thus brought up to become chargeable to the parish in after life, as was frequently the case with those brought up in the hospital or workhouse school;" while he adds that the children when grown up frequently support their foster parents in after life. And the satisfaction of the Edinburgh guardians with the system is further shown by the fact that in their recent erection of a workhouse no accommodation for children is provided.

In England the system has not been in operation long enough to be so thoroughly tested as it has been in Scotland, but all the information which reaches us as to its operation is thoroughly satisfactory. In one union with which we are well acquainted—the Chorlton Union, near Manchester—everything indicates that the success of the system will equal that in Scotland. Homes among the very élite of the working classes have been readily found for all the Protestant orphans of suitable age in the workhouse, and frequent and unexpected visits leave no doubt that the relation of the children to their foster parents is of the best and happiest kind. One important fact is that it is found, unmistakably, that more money is spent upon the children than is received from the Union. The foster parents generally speak with pride of the children's improvement in health and intelligence since they left the workhouse. And in many cases it is certain that the children would not be allowed to return thither, if from change of residence the Union allowance were necessarily withdrawn.

We ask our readers to ponder these things. Large asylums have a noble look, and good workhouse orphan schools present capital results in scholarship; but we believe that the rough and varied training of head and hand and heart, which even the most ordinary home affords, is infinitely better as a real preparation for life. It is a matter of concern to all, and one in which rich and poor alike may have some part by calling attention to it, and helping to truer and more Christian thought respecting it.

POOLE CHAPEL.

We often feel that our larger and wealthier congregations are by no means as ready as they should be in assisting the smaller and poorer ones. Not seldom these are left to struggle on encumbered with a debt which, though of no great amount, is yet sufficient to occasion them constant anxiety and interfere with the success of their efforts, when a little help from only a few of those who are so well able to afford it would set them free and send them on their way rejoicing to do good. Such a case is that of Poole, to which we would earnestly call the attention of our friends; and the circumstances of which they will find given in a letter from the Rev. John Cropper, who is thoroughly acquainted with them, in this day's Herald.

AMERICAN NOTES.

From the Pall Mall we learn that the Philadelphia Sunday Mercury keeps a "religious reporter" on its staff. For five years "Charley Graffen" was the man, and did a world of good by "tomahawking hypocrites." But, a year ago, writes his successor, "Charley folded the mantle of sleep around him, and lay down to pleasant dreams." His tomahawk, however, seems to have fallen into hands able to wield it with force and spirit, as one or two specimens of his style of dealing with "the cloth" will show. The pastor of the Tabernacle Methodist Church took no holiday this year. Nevertheless, says Charley's successor, "we do not expect to survive our dear brother. Through the instrumentality of black tea and fried potatoes, he will, doubtless, extend his longevity to the year of our Lord 1892. When called to the harvest of the Lord, he will certainly come bearing with him a two-horse load of first-class sheaves." Brother Murphy, too, kept his church open all the summer. He is another devoted man. "The first sheaf he garnered—and it has proved to be the base of the biggest kind of a subsequent stack of them—was Alfred C. Harmer, now engaged in piously laying out the saints in the glades and dells of lovely Old Oaks." The Rev. E. E. Arnold is described as "an extremely fine specimen," whom the ladies of his parish regard as "by long odds the best-looking pastor in all Pennsylvania. He doesn't need any artificial bloom of roses; while his moustache is as a trumpet vine throwing its laughing tendrils over the arch of a garden gate." The Rev. S. W.

Hallowell is of a rougher stamp; he is "upwards of seventy years of age, and has constantly kept the devil with a black eye since the first day he received holy orders." The reporter, having heard this gentleman preach, was offered the hospitality of a brother "from New England, the land of cold Sunday dinners and sixty-minute prayers." The hospitality was declined, because after such a sermon nothing short of broiled fowl would do; and luckily, Mr. Brick, of the American House, had a spring chicken ready. Having done justice to this, the "religious" reporter went to hear Brother Badger, of St. Stephen's. Mr. Badger is a small man, and "as he emerged from the vestry room in his white surplice, we thought of Zacheus climbing the sycamore on the day that our Lord took dinner at his house." He passes his time in a state of warfare with Brother Joe Parker, who holds out-door prayer meetings, and "addresses the Lord in shockingly ungrammatical English." The reporter deals with laity as well as clergy in the same free style. A Mr. Jordan, "who so long supplied Philadelphia with bottled stout," having joined a Catholic Church, is described as "one of the few men over thirty years of age that hasn't lost the faculty of blushing;" and Brother William Matthews, just fresh from California, is credited with "a heart about the size of an egg-plant" and a pocket-book to match. "It is a nice thing," muses the reporter, "to have treasures laid up where burglars can't get at them; a big balance in bank is also a good thing. We should like a taste of the sensation." Noticing the departure of a gentleman from the Reformed Presbyterian Church, the writer says:—"Brother Dunlap, like so many useful Christians, finds the road to fortune a good deal shorter by way of New York than by way of Philadelphia. The only drawback to New York is that its distance from Heaven exceeds that of this city about 65,000 miles. When Brother Dunlap starts for Paradise he intends to do so from Philadelphia." After visiting a suburban church, the reporter writes:—"Our brother John Stone, the oilman on Walnut-street, was there, and the manner in which he acknowledged himself a miserable sinner was succulently refreshing." In one of his exordiums, "Charley's" successor says, "we don't believe that when Moses came down the lava-strewn slope of Sinai he had any more idea of a Sunday Mercury than he had of a galvanic battery, a locomotive, or automatic machines for making bricks." Which is very likely.

The United States Economist and Dry Goods Reporter is leavening its great broadside of commercial news and trading notices by the republication, in extenso, of Mr. Spurgeon's sermons.

Trouble seems likely to arise between the United States revenue officers and the Mormons, owing to the many efforts of the latter to evade paying taxes. A majority of the houses at Salt Lake have been consecrated for "religious purposes," and the theatre, though it has long been in use, has been purposely left "unfinished." On the subject of polygamy, Brigham Young is becoming sarcastic. He says he is ready to limit himself to one woman, if every member of Congress will do the same.

The "backwoods' preacher," of whose jubilee we gave a short account a fortnight ago, has written the following characteristic letter on the subject:

"Through the mercy of God I have survived the operation of the jubilee at Lincoln, and I am glad to know that while the heavenly bodies run their appointed and brilliant courses, and God rules supreme, I shall never see another jubilee on earth. But do not think me ungrateful to my brethren and friends at large, for I have no language at my command to express my gratitude to them for the honour done me on the occasion, such was the sudden transition from frontier, backwoods life, in which I had served the Church for sixty-five years as a travelling Methodist preacher, to this golden and silver age in which my fiftieth year as Presiding Elder expired. Add to this the eloquent addresses made on the occasion, well calculated to make me doubt my identity. It is true, I had read of Peter the Great, Peter the Hermit, and Peter the Apostle, but Peter the Cartwright, I said to myself, who is he? It is also true the golden and silver tokens of respect were abundant. All honour to the donors; their names will go down to generations yet to come; and while I remember the good word, 'Blessed is the man that endureth temptation,' yet the thought would rise, What shall I and my old faithful wife eat and wear? for all the available means received on the occasion that could be used in that way with any consistent propriety would not secure a comfortable overcoat or warm shawl to breast the winter storms of Illinois. I now say I feel thankful to the Lord that I have been able, by grace, so to speak before the world and the Church as to secure their respect and confidence. If I live and have health sufficient I shall be out among you."

A large number of the prelates of the Roman Catholic Church in America are leaving, or have left, to attend the Ecumenical Council. Nearly every American bishop will go to Rome—but one, so far as is known, remaining in this country. He—Bishop Rosecrans, of Cincinnati—sends Father Hecker, a noted priest of New York, as his proxy.

The Nation is glad to learn that Father Hyacinth has had sufficient perception, or been sufficiently well advised, to avoid the snares laid for him by noisy and foolish Protestants. They are only able to get their card into his room, and he remains in blessed ignorance of their "views" as to what he ought to do. What has been most astonishing about their performances has been the ignorance or forgetfulness shown in them of the fact, that whatever value the Father has as an enemy of the Papacy lies solely in the fact that he is still a Catholic. If he left the Church, he would perhaps draw a crowd for a month or two to hear him speak, but after that his denunciations of Rome would weigh even less with the world than those of any average Protestant minister, who disposes of the Pope and Cardinals, under three heads and a conclusion, in a Sunday evening discourse. Besides, to all right-minded persons, the monk would prove himself simply a charlatan by running over here to put himself in the hands of sensation-alists for public exhibition, at such a crisis in his religious history as that through which he is now passing. Strange as it may seem to a large class of preachers, and lecturers, and writers, and politicians, there are times in which men of real mental power and real weight of character do not wish to star it at public meetings and receptions, and feel the need of solitude and reflection and the society of intimate friends only. It is not everybody who is willing to reveal his deepest personal experiences at fifty cents a head or twenty dollars an article.

We learn with regret that the late alarming fire in Montreal has completely destroyed the roof of our church there, and done much damage to it in other ways besides. It was one of the finest churches in the city, and it is estimated that the cost of restoring it will be not less than $10,000. This untoward event will, for a time, necessarily impede the labours of our esteemed minister, the Rev. John Corder, and his congregation; but the energetic spirit which he and they have manifested in the past will, we feel sure, now only show itself still more vigorously, and that we shall ere long have to report that their church has been reopened in even greater beauty than before.

GEORGE PEABODY.

ON Sunday last, the Great Meeting, at Leicester, was crowded by numbers rarely witnessed before, to listen to a lecture* from the Rev. C. C. Coe on the generous philanthropist whose death has called forth such regret on both sides of the Atlantic. Taking for his text, "He hath dispersed, he hath given to the poor: his righteousness endureth for ever his horn shall be exalted with honour" (Psalm cxli., 9), Mr. Coe, after a brief sketch of Mr. Peabody's life, said:

I remark, in the first place, that he was liberal with his own money—with money earned by his own exertion. That which comes easily is apt to go easily; and the man who is born rich, or who comes into the sudden possession of riches, may be liberal from a mere ignorance of the worth of wealth: and is certainly not in a good position to estimate the cost of its production. But the man who starts as a poor apprentice—whose first commercial speculation is ruined by an unforeseen accident—knows something of the difficulty of beginning to acquire; while he, who is sought out for his business talent, and by whose exertions success is mainly gained for the business with which he is connected, knows something of the difficulty of keeping and of increasing wealth. The self-made man owns property which is of his own earning, and if he gives this away, the gift is the more valuable on that account. Next, we may observe that the money of George Peabody was amassed not only by his own exertions, but also by the strictest honour and probity. There is always a fear lest the man who has amassed a large property should have done so by unworthy means; and it is painful to think of money so acquired being offered for the service of God and man, as though by the gift of a part the use of the rest might be secured and sanctified! No such taint of suspicion rests upon the acquisitions of George Peabody. Speaking of his business relations in London, the writer of a notice in the Times says, "The magnitude of his transactions in that capacity (as merchant and banker), perhaps, fell short of one or two other great houses of the same class; but in honour, faith, punctuality, and public confidence, the firm of George Peabody and Co., of Warrford Court, stood second to none!" He gained his wealth by his own exertion and talent, and he gained it honourably. And I may further add that he was not led away and deluded, as so many have been, into worshipping money as the god of his idolatry. As Mr. Gladstone has well said, he taught "that lesson which is the most difficult and the most needful of all lessons—that of showing that in amassing a colossal fortune a man may be the master of his wealth instead of being its slave." It is quite clear that he did not pursue wealth for the mere sake of adding heap to heap, and fortune to fortune, and gloating with a miser's passion over the increasing hoard. Nor did he think, as some have conscientiously thought, that his wealth would be applied to better use, if employed in trade than if given wisely for charitable purposes. Now I do not wish to unsay any word I may ever have said in favour of the conscientious use of wealth in the business of life. I believe that a conscientious man may do his duty in his business as well as anywhere else, and that the most beneficent results will follow the frugal, and intelligent, and upright employment of capital. Still, human nature has other needs than those which are satisfied by a commercial prosperity;—needs on which, perhaps, in some subtle way that commercial prosperity itself may depend. The money taken from a business, in order to promote education, in order to restore commercial confidence, in order to meet national difficulties, and to save national honour, in order to make the homes of the poor more comfortable, and even to aid the charitable pitying efforts to discover traces of brave lost voyagers in Arctic seas—such money perhaps may, after all, be only lent to the Lord, and may be blessed so as to promote the social peace, and the mutual confidence, and the commercial productiveness of the society in the midst of which such sacrifices have been made. But, if such efforts were not commercially productive, they have a far higher value; they lift man into a region of higher life; they promote nobler interests than pertain to this existence, and in proportion as they seem to sacrifice present pecuniary profits they call out the noblest principle in the nature of man—the law of disinterested affection. Mr. Peabody was not one of those who, in getting wealth, are so enamoured of business that they cannot promote any other interest with a hearty zeal and good-will. And least of all, was this good American citizen one who pursued wealth for the sake of the luxuries and personal indulgences which it can purchase. Simple in his habits, his needs were few; and it was this absence of personal gratification which made it possible for him on the one hand to gain a princely fortune, and on the other hand to administer it with a more than princely munificence. There is absolutely nothing then in the conditions under which the wealth of Mr. Peabody was acquired to dim the glory of his charitable donations. What he gave he had first earned by vigorous, manly effort; what he gave so freely he had acquired with the utmost honesty and probity; while in the acquisition of his fortune he clearly escaped the temptations which so often induce men to pursue wealth for the sake of gain, for the sake of mere business, or in the hope of earning the means of luxurious enjoyment.

Let us now consider the way in which he bestowed the wealth which had been so honourably gained, and the spirit with which he was ever animated. We may safely say, that throughout his life he ever remained faithful to the solemn vow which he made when he was a mere youth: "If God spares my life and prospers me in business, then the property of which I may become possessed I will devote to His glory, in seeking the good of my fellow-men, wherever their claims may seem most to rest upon me." He fulfilled this vow in the first place by the magnificent extent of his munificence. Clearly he was not one of those who offer sacrifices unto the Lord, of that which doth cost them nothing. When he was a rising business man, at that crisis of a man's life when money, I should suppose, seems of the highest value, and when the first taste of success naturally suggests the possibility of further and of speedier gain, I find it said of him that, "with the generosity which distinguished him throughout life, he charged himself with the maintenance and education of his father's family." In a commercial crisis he did much to save the American credit abroad; he acted with the utmost patriotism, as well as with the greatest financial skill; and then refused all recompense for his successful services. At the time of the Great Exhibition in 1851, he re-deemed the good name of his countrymen by promptly supplying a sum of $15,000, which was required to place the contributions of America in orderly array. He gave first $20,000, which sum was afterwards increased to $500,000, for educational purposes in his native city of Danvers. In 1852, he found the necessary means for equipping the vessel which had been offered for the purpose of carrying Dr. Kane in search of Sir John Franklin, at a time when Congress hesitated to do so, and when hesitation would have involved the abandonment of the expedition. In 1856-7, he expended $500,000 for the purpose of establishing in Baltimore the scene of his early mercantile successes, a Literary and Scientific Institute. His contribution to the American Southern Educational Fund long since amounted to $2,000,000, and may, ere this, have far exceeded that sum. For a long time he contemplated making a donation to the poor of London; and accordingly he gave first £150,000, then £100,000, and again £100,000, and he has left in his will a further sum of £150,000, making a total of half-a-million, to the poor of London, and a million and a quarter spent in charity during his life. Now, rich man as he was, I contend that he gave to such an extent that he could feel the loss. He did not deny himself the necessities, or even the luxuries of life; but that was because he had no selfish indulgence to forego. But he did make himself sensibly and observably poorer. If he had had any selfish greed in him he could not have parted with such sums without regret. There are few wealthy men who would not look twice at one thousand dollars, to say nothing of a quarter of a million sterling, before parting with it. He gave sums relatively large enough to be missed; but he had a soul too noble to feel the loss as anything but a spiritual gain.

It is another element in the gigantic disinterestedness that he should give such large sums during his life. When the sons of William the Conqueror wished him to divide his kingdom amongst them, he replied that he did not intend to undress before he went to bed. Most rich men feel in the same way; and though they are compelled to do something for their children, and may rejoice to set them up in a remunerative business of some sort, they are very apt to leave bequests for charitable purposes in their wills, instead of giving noble donations during their life. To do this is thought a great virtue—a few legacies to a few philanthropic institutions form that charity which covers the multitude of sins, and constitutes a splendid topic for friendly eulogium and for pulpit eloquence. But what does this vaunted generosity amount to, after all? It comes to this: A man says, "I will keep my wealth as long as I can; when I can't keep it any longer, then I'll begin to be generous with it." There is something very touching in the unconscious selfishness which finds expression in the words of the dying girl in Tennyson's May Queen:

"Good night, Good night; when I have said Good night for evermore,
And you see me carried out from the threshold of the door,
Don't let Effie come to see me till my grave be growing green,
She'll be a better child to you than I have ever been.
She'll find my garden tools upon the granary floor;
Let her take them,—they are hers,—I shall never garden more!"

In this passage, almost unrivalled in its pathos and affection, note the unconscious selfishness displayed. She gives away that which she can no longer use. And it is in a similar way that this age sets about its most approved charity. "God may have my property," says one man—"men may have my estates for charitable purposes," says another, "when I cannot keep them any longer." George Peabody did not wait for death before he gave good gifts unto men. He gave what he gave; he did not simply direct where they should fall out of his dying hand! He gave at a cost to himself, but it was not to purchase anything for himself. He had no afterthought of personal ambition, no political or party motive to influence him in what he gave. The honours and rewards which others gladly receive he respectfully declined. It was not to gain a baronetcy or a grand cross that he spent his money so freely. He died as he lived, a plain American citizen, the beloved and honoured denizen of our land, the friend of England's Queen, and of all who, like her, know how to honour such transcendent worth. But he had not such recognition before him as the motive of his conduct, for he avoided as much as possible the public recognition of his services. Still less, if possible, did he seek to aggrandise himself by promoting the selfish interests of sect, or party, or nation. The conditions and circumstances of his own career had trained him for the exercise of the largest sympathies. He was a citizen of the world, and the cause which he aimed to promote was the cause of his fellow-creatures' happiness. His educational bequests were based upon purely unsectarian principles. Although a Massachusetts man, and thoroughly loyal to the cause of the American Union, his sympathies were substantially exhibited towards the South after the conclusion of the civil war; and so far from fostering the miserable hatred and jealousy which Americans often feel towards England—which are so frequently a mere party cry and means of personal aggrandisement—Mr. Peabody gave his munificent donation to the poor of London at the very time when, owing to the civil war and the Trent affair, a good deal of ill-will existed between Great Britain and America. As one said at that time, "Here is a man, a denizen of our city, bound to us by no ties but those of common humanity, at a crisis when some men delight themselves in reviving the memory of ancient jealousies, talking fiercely of national animosities and implacable hates, who stands out and rebukes our unworthy suspicions by an act of kindness to our poor, which brings the blush of shame to our cheeks when we think of merchant princes of our own, who, living have been strangely insensible to the claims of Christian charity, and dying have left no trace behind."

But while this munificence was most disinterested, in that it arose from no selfish motive whatever, we must not suppose that it is without its unsought and unthought-of reward. The act itself is its own sublime reward. Tradition had well nigh let slip those precious words of Jesus, "It is more blessed to give than to receive;" but they deserve to be cherished in our inmost hearts, for to noble souls it is a greater pleasure to do good than to accumulate wealth; and though a sense of loss might well come in connection with such princely gifts, the heart would bound again at the joyful idea of the service which was thus conferred. At such a crisis we can well believe that

"Love took up the harp of life and smote on all its strings with might, Smote the chord of self which trembling passed in music out of sight."

Such munificence is its own reward in the hour of death. The rich man dies, and it will be woe to him if all that is distinctive of him dies with him! But the generous soul who has freely parted with some, can gladly part with all of outward wealth, if such be the will of God. But in parting with this he does not lose the upright mind which won this wealth, nor the generous soul of love which dispersed it so freely. It has been truly written as the epitaph of a generous man, "What I spent I had, what I left I lost, what I gave I have." That for which he seemed to get nothing in return remains his for evermore; for "he hath dispersed, he hath given to the poor, therefore his righteousness endureth for ever; his horn shall be exalted with honour." On earth his name is honoured. He has been already honoured by a splendid and touching funeral, in the noblest of churches, where he was mourned by rich and poor, by English and Americans; and he will be honoured for generations to come in the schools of Danvers and of Baltimore, in the great Harvard University, and in the Southern States of his native land. He will be honoured in the overcrowded districts of our own huge metropolis; he will be honoured where merchants most do congregate around our Royal Exchange; he will be honoured even in frozen Arctic lands, on whose map his name appears; he will be honoured in innumerable homes and hearts made happy by his munificence. He will be honoured because he has offered a "more acceptable sacrifice" than ordinary humanity, or than extraordinary humanity, can boast; and by it, he being dead will long speak to every soul which knows how to appreciate disinterested goodness. While in another world he will stand pre-eminent among those to whom the Saviour will declare, "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto the least of these, my brethren, ye have done it unto me." Over such a grave the rich and poor may well shake hands, and thank the God who is the maker of them all. And the common emotion of painful regret, overwhelmed by joyful admiration, which thrills through all England and America to-day, will do more to bring us closely together than the telegraph wire along which the news of George Peabody's death was sped, or the swiftest sailing steamers in one of which his remains are to be conveyed across the Atlantic. If only the spirit of this good citizen could be poured forth upon all men, the bitter envy with which class pursues class, and nation regards nation, would quickly die away, and a Christ-like love would reign in every heart!

But, my friends, it is not with mere admiration, however cordial, that a life like this of George Peabody ought to be viewed. Depend upon it, it is for us to imitate, not to admire only; and my fear is lest some should think that this lesson is for those who are extraordinarily rich, and not for the men of moderate income, and least of all for those who work with their hands for their daily bread. My fear is that some man with a large family should say, "Well, Peabody is no example to me, for he had never wife or child." My fear is that each one of you should claim to be a warm admirer of the departed philanthropist, but with kind consideration should depute it to some other person to become his imitator. Brethren, he has imitators more than we are apt to suppose. The poor widow who gives her mite to the treasury of the Lord is an imitator of George Peabody. The man who maintains the poor relatives that belong to him is doing what George Peabody did. The man who works hard and earns a good living, and spends it not on selfish personal enjoyment, but in ways in which many can participate, has the spirit which animated George Peabody. But it must be confessed that there are many who need to study this example a little more; and they should ask themselves these questions:—Am I using my talents as faithfully as George Peabody did his? Am I working from a sense of duty, and not from personal greed? Am I prepared to give as much in proportion to my means as he did? Am I prepared to take his vow,

"If God should prosper me, I will spend my wealth for others rather than for myself; and the fellow-men by whose help I have amassed wealth shall have their share, and shall have it in such a way that they shall not be degraded into paupers, but shall be educated into good and honourable citizens?" These are the questions which the spirit of the departed philanthropist puts from his grave; and the answers which we give as individuals and as a nation will be written in the history of the world, and will help to modify in no slight degree the spiritual capacity and sympathy which our deathless souls will carry with them to the portal of the Eternal Ages!

FIRESIDE READINGS.

UNWEPT TEARS.

OUR tears full oft from different sources rise,
But ah! what tears of pity, pain, and grief,
Yielding my burdened soul a short relief,
Have flowed in bitter floods from these sad eyes!
Yet there are tears that will not, cannot flow,—
Too deep within the heart's most hidden cell
In dark and seething agony they dwell,
And none their doleful meaning e'er can know,
Save they who in their misery heard them there.
Oh! could they from their scalding prison break,
Of what sharp pangs, what anguish would they speak—
Of vain remorse—of woe and wild despair!
O God! be this in thy remembrance kept,
And, pitying, think on all our tears unwept!

SAM LAWSON.

ONE of the best drawn characters in Mrs. Stowe's "Old Town Folks" is Sam Lawson, the shiftless, lazy, inquisitive Bohemian of the place, who is for ever drawing morals and quoting texts. This is one of his side hits at the old hard Calvinism:—"I s'pose that Deacon Bangs is a Christian, but, lordy massy, he's one o' yer drefle ugly kind o' Christians, that when they gits their backs wud do worse things than sinners will. I really think they kind o' take advantage o' their position, and think es they're going to be saved by grace—grace shall hev enough on't. And of old Crab. Ef I pay for good strong doctrine, why I want to hev good strong doctrine, says old Crab, says he. Ef I pays for hell fire I want to hev hell fire; and hev it hot, too. I don't want none o' yer prophesying smooth things. Why, says he, look at Dr. Stern. His folks has the very hair took off their heads most every Sunday, and he don't get no more'n we pay Parson Perry." Sam, though full of good nature, is dreadfully exasperating to his wife Hepsy, the stirring, scolding mother of his six children. Being asked one day concerning the health of his household, he replies:—"Wal, the young uns has all got the whoopin' cough, an' I'm e'en a'most beat out with 'em. For fust its one barks, and then another, an' then all together. An' then Hepsy she gets riled, an' she scolds, an' take it all together a feller's head gets a kind o' turned. It's enough to wean a body from this world. Lordy massy, yester afternoon I see yer Aunt Keziah an' yer Aunt Lois out a-cuttin' cowslip greens t'other side o'th' river, an' the sun it shone so bright, an' the turtles and frogs they kind o' peeped so pleasant, and yer aunts they sot on the bank so kind o' easy and free, an' I stood there a-lookin' on 'em, an' I couldn't help a-thinkin', lordy massy, I wish t' I was an old maid. Folks 'scapes a great deal that don't hev no young uns a-hangin' onter 'em."

One of the most solemn national festivals was Thanksgiving-Day, which was kept with great social hospitality. Sam's house was never prepared for ordinary requirements, much less for extra expenditure, so the night before Thanksgiving-Day he shambled down to Mrs. Badger's farm with the view of borrowing or begging a turkey for next day's dinner. Welcomed to a seat and a mug of cider in the chimney corner, he commenced in a musing tone:—"Lordy massy, how prosperous everything does seem here, so different from what 'tis i' our house. There's Hepsy, she's all in a steew, she says she's sure she don't see how she's to keep thanksgiving dinner, an' she's down on me about it, jest as ef 'twas my fault. Yeh see last winter our old gobbler got froze. You know, Miss Badger, that ere cold night we had last winter. Wal, I was off with Jake Marshall that night. Ye see Jake he had to take old General Seaborn's corpse into Boston to the family vault, an' Jake he kind o' hated to go alone; 'twas a drefful cold time, an' he ses to me, 'Sam, you jes' go long with me.' So I was sort o' sorry for him, an' I kind o' thought I'd go long. Wal, to Josh Bissels' tavern we stopped to take a little suthin' warm, an' we sot an' sot over the fire till fust we knew we kind o' got asleep, an' when we woke up we found we'd left the old general hitched up t' th' post pretty much all night. Wal, didn't hurt him none, poor man; 'twas always a favourite spot o' his'n. But, taking one thing with another, I didn't get home till about noon next day, an' Hepsy she was right down on me. She said the baby was sick, and there hadn't been no wood split, nor the barn fastened up, nor nothin'.

Lordy massy, I didn't mean no harm; I thought there was wood enough, and I thought likely Hepsy'd get out and fasten up the barn. But Hepsy, she was in one o' her contrary streaks an' wouldn't do a thing, an' when I went to look, why sure 'nuff there was our old Tom turkey froze as stiff as a snake, his claws gist a-sticking right straight up like this." And Sam struck an attitude expressive of a frozen turkey. Nevertheless he went home with a turkey and a mince and a pumpkin pie for the little ones. "Poor things; they ought to have something good to eat Thanksgiving-Day: 'taint their fault that they've got a shiftless father," was the grandmother's remark. And Sam moralised to the children as they walked beside him, "A body'd think that Hepsy'd learn to trust in Providence, but she don't. She allers has a thanksgiving dinner provided, but that ere woman aint grateful for it by no manner o' means. Now she'll be jest as cross as she can be 'cause this 'ere aint our turkey and these 'ere aint our pies. Folks does lose so much that hes such dispositions."

Miss Asphyxia Smith is a terribly hard-working female, whose views of life contrast remarkably with those of Sam Lawson's: "O, well, if folks is goin' to begin to talk about being happy, I ha'n't got time; it don't seem to me that that's what this ere world's for, but hard work, I s'pose." Compare this with Sam. "I aint a wastin' my time if I be enjoying myself. I say it's a part o' what we's made for."

PROTOPLASM AT THE ANTIPODES.

IN the first number of "Nature," a new journal of science, after mentioning the interest which the Protoplasm theory has excited in Melbourne, and referring to the Rev. Henry Bigginson's able lecture upon it with an unworthy sneer, we have the following practical application of it in the Australian colony:

"THE PHYSICAL BASIS OF LIFE.

Huxley's celebrated Essay on this subject is lectured on daily, by
who has made the matter a life study. It is also illustrated daily at his tables, where the 'physical basis' can be laid in from 11 to 3, in the best cooked and most varied HOT LUNCHEON."

A BURROWING RACE.

DR. LIVINGSTONE, in his search after the sources of the Nile, has lighted upon a mystery of another kind. "Always something new from Africa," he says. "A large tribe lives in underground houses in Rua. Some excavations are said to be thirty miles long, and have running rills in them—a whole district can stand a siege in them. The 'writings' therein, I have been told by some of the people, are drawings of animals, and not letters, otherwise I should have gone to see them. People very dark, well made, and outer angle of eyes slanting inwards."

MARRYING TO ORDER.

A CORRESPONDENT of the Daily News gives this among the incidents of the Empress Eugenie's visit to Egypt:—"At about half-past ten on Saturday evening some wild flames were seen, and some wilder cries announced the Viceroy's and the Empress's approach to the bazaars. The Empress, who must surely have drunk of the waters which preserve youth and beauty, wore a pale blue satin evening dress, with a slender fillet of velvet of the same colour ornamented by a diamond of immense size, and with clusters of the same precious stone in her hair, was without bonnet or hat, and indeed had come direct from the dinner table at his Highness's harem to the wedding of an officer in the Khedive's service, and from thence to her inspection of Cairo at night. Actuated by the hospitable desire of showing his fair and illustrious guest as much as possible of the manners and customs of the people over whom he rules, the Khedive instructed one of his court to take to himself a wife last Saturday, in order that the Empress might behold the ceremonies attending a Mohammedan marriage. In so small a matter, of course to speak was to be obeyed, and the officer in question was made happy to order, and with much pomp, the Khedive giving away the bride, or performing the Egyptian equivalent to that formal act of duty, and providing her with a magnificent dowry."

TENTERDEN DISTRICT ASSOCIATION.

THE anniversary of this society was held on the 10th instant. The Rev. ROBERT SPEARS was the preacher, his text being Hebrews ix, 10, "The time of reformation." There was a large and attentive congregation.

In the evening a public meeting was held in the Town Hall, when about one hundred and eighty sat down to tea, friends being present from Battle, Cranbrook, Rolvenden, &c. The Rev. J. A. BRIGGS presided. He remarked on the largeness of the assembly, and how pleased their late pastor, Mr. Talbot, would have been to have seen such a meeting, and hoped the people were prepared to work, for Mr. Dendy had plenty for them to do.

JOSEPH MUNN, Esq., Mayor of Tenterden, spoke to the first sentiment, "The Tenterden District Association—may it be instrumental in strengthening all outlying congregations, and may their united action encourage the Rev. R. C. Dendy in the good work he has undertaken." Mr. Munn thought there was great good in having these meetings in bringing the people together, and called upon the meeting to give Mr. Dendy a hearty welcome, which was cordially done by three rounds of applause.

The Rev. R. C. DENDY said he could not have been more kindly received among his own relatives and friends, and was only afraid he should not be able to meet their expectations. At a meeting held that afternoon a plan for an exchange of ministers throughout the district had been formed, which he hoped they would be able to carry out. He always liked meetings of this sort, and thought we ought to attend similar ones in other places. This very evening, said he, my late congregation at Flowery Field are met to welcome my successor, the Rev. J. K. Smith.

The Rev. JAMES BAYLEY, late of Cranbrook, now of Battle, responded to the next sentiment, "May our national education be complete, while unsectarian in its character."

The CHAIRMAN proposed a vote of thanks to Mr. Spears for his sermon, to which Mr. Spears replied. The Chairman then made a few remarks on the freedom of the Primitive Church, which he was convinced was a decidedly Unitarian one, and said we ought to keep our chapels as free as our Presbyterian forefathers had left them.

Rev. R. E. B. MACLELLAN, in responding to the sentiment, "A free Church in a free state the ecclesiastical want of our age," gave a most excellent address.

The CHAIRMAN then proposed "Our denominational literature," and said that he could always find something in the most advanced to improve his less advanced theology. But he must remind them that we cannot have it without giving it our support by purchasing it.

The Rev. R. SPEARS responded, after which Mr. MUNN proposed a vote of thanks to Mr. Briggs for his kind services in the chair, which was carried, and Mr. Mace took his place.

Mr. BRIGGS said he was glad to take a part in that glorious meeting, and hoped he should often be with them, as he was only going to reside at a short distance (Hastings).

Mr. H. BURGESS, of Battle, spoke to the state of the Battle congregation. He said they had had no minister for some time, but Mr. Bayley had now settled with them.

The meeting broke up after singing the Evening Hymn.

INTELLIGENCE.

LONGTON.—A tea meeting was held in the Mission room on Monday last in aid of the chapel building fund, when about ninety persons were present. After tea the chair was taken by the Rev. N. Green, and old and young heartily enjoyed themselves, the meeting being diversified with speeches, singing, recitations, &c.

SHEFFIELD.—The Rev. George Knight, till about six months ago minister of the Baptist congregation, Stanbridge, has received, and accepted, a cordial and unanimous invitation to take charge of the Upperthorpe congregation.

STAND.—On Wednesday evening, Nov. 10th, a lecture was delivered by the Rev. W. C. Squier, on "The Pilgrim Fathers." The lecture was illustrated by some large coloured pictures descriptive of the scenes and sufferings which the heroic founders of New England passed through. It afforded pleasure to a considerable number of persons.

STOCKTON.—On the 7th and 14th inst. the Rev. W. Elliott delivered two lectures on the Doctrine of Eternal Torments. At the first the chapel was filled; at the second crowds gathered about the door before it was opened, and the building became so densely packed in every part, the vestry, aisles, communion, and pulpit stairs, that Mr. Elliott could not get into the pulpit without stepping over some of the people, and not more than two-thirds of them were able to get in. The lecture, a very long one, was listened to with deepest interest. In order to counteract the influence of the lecture, the Orthodox distributed tracts to the hearers as they left, and large crowds remained in the neighbourhood discussing the subject. Many who were never in a Unitarian place of worship have heard the lectures, and a strong impression favourable to Unitarianism has been produced.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE CHAPEL AT POOLE.

To the Editors.—I would respectfully and earnestly ask your attention, and that of your readers, to the circular which is being issued, through your paper and in other ways, respecting Poole Chapel.

In my last interview with my deeply lamented friend, the Rev. R. B. Aspland, he volunteered his promise to promote a general subscription for the liquidation of the remainder of the debt incurred by the re-erection of the above-named place of worship. He said such was the interest and gratification felt by him in the character, zeal, and exertions of the Poole congregation that he would most cheerfully give them every assistance in his power to remove their pecuniary difficulties. Death has intervened and deprived us of his aid. And hence, since there is an urgent necessity for the completion of that in which (had he lived) he would have given us his valuable assistance, I beg permission to ask your advocacy and the pecuniary contributions of your readers in behalf of the society herein named. £210 from the public will entirely free the society from debt, and that sum, if this appeal be responded to by the Unitarian body generally (even in limited gifts), may at once, I conceive, and without discomfort to any one, be subscribed, and paid to whom it is due.

The school and the congregation are steadily increasing; and I can appeal with unhesitating confidence to the gentlemen whose names are appended to the circular, and also to the Rev. John Wright, of Bury, who lately visited and preached to the congregation, for testimony to the goodness of the cause for which I ask assistance, and also to the excellence of the men and women who uphold it. Generous help has been hitherto given and most gratefully acknowledged; still that portion of the burden which will remain after what they intend giving is really more than they can of themselves remove.

To you, therefore, and to all whom you can induce to lend the Poole congregation their needed assistance, is this urgent and final request made by, yours truly,

JOHN CROPPER.

THE THEOLOGICAL TENDENCIES OF THE AGE.—II.

To the Editors.—It was implied in my last that the very profane creed that "God, in starting man on his earthly career, gives him a revelation and guide that totally clashes with the conscience with which he has given him to use it," is fast foundering. It was also implied that in this progressive time Unitarianism as a body is far from occupying that prominent position that religious free thought calls for, and which, were its teachers possessed of half as much wit as wisdom, and its supporters of a tithe as much enthusiasm as wealth, it could not fail soon to attain. Although Unitarians were wont to be most remarkable for their humility and sociable disposition towards their less fortunate neighbours, it is now rather freely asserted that we are proud, and show no desire to be joined in our worship by any who cannot come in broad cloth and fine linen. Whether or not there be any foundation for this, it is evident that some of our ministers and prominent laymen consider that those who can't come without so much urging and coaxing have no claim on our notice. This, I think, is making but little allowance for the circles in which large numbers have been bred, their labour and companions into which they are daily thrown, and the general tone and atmosphere of the localities of their homes. It is, too, not at all uncommon to find in our congregations everything suppressed which is not likely to tally with the taste and sentiment of the most profound and contemplative of the assembly; thus the young and less serious, who might in a few years many of them become valuable members, are led to form other associations, and carry with them that spirit and animation for which such congregations are drooping. Not the least important part of worship is its music; and a very enchanting and effective part of this, especially in rural districts where the sound has room to soften, is a set of nice-toned bells. We have seen large and respectable congregations at churches where the sermon was felt to be quite an insignificant part of the affair. One I have known, that stands on an eminence near the base of several lofty hills which rise from a most beautiful and magnetic valley, whose bell-peals are really bewitching. The children when gambolling in the surrounding meadows have almost fancied the flowers they were plucking looked pleasanter and smelled sweeter by their melodies; the young men and maidens when taking their love rambles in the leafy groves have felt a fresh thrill of affection warm up their breasts at an outburst of those musical strains; and even the aged have started a tear of tenderness when listening to those peals which reminded them afresh of the day when they, young and sprightly, were welcomed by the same sweet notes into a new and happy stage of their lives. Then there is at the services the numerous body of earnest choristers, among whom are a dozen boys whose unbroken voices give a sweetness and harmony which cannot be attained in church music without them; and who are dressed in a garb that is in keeping with, and seems to lustrate the happy and heavenly music they are producing. Here, if a person ventures to respond rather audibly in the liturgy (as we have seen it in some churches) there is no danger of a number of heads being turned to see what's the matter. There is a charm about the whole proceedings independently of the sermon that has a very attractive, winning, and religious effect. In this, as in other things, knowledge, however deep, is of little use unless there is some philosophy and taste in the application of it. There was a certain tradesman whose knowledge of his wares, uprightness of dealing, facilities and disposition to sell cheap were second to none, and yet, sooner than (as he said) pander to the new-fangled notions of the populace by supplying what he thought might be done better without—sooner than bring his shop into a prominent part of the town, or enlarge his windows to make his goods conspicuous, he would be crowded out, and thus lost wealth, note, everything which his class seek to gain. Some of our ministers seem to have graduated at a like school. Why not seek to make their voices reach the multitude? Why not seize on an opportunity now and then for speaking on doctrine, explaining without any shyness what is Unitarianism, for expounding its broad, liberal, and rational principles, and thus dispelling some of the wild notions with which it is regarded by thousands who are themselves of the same faith? And why take such pains in preparing sermons as if to be held up to the criticism of all the sages in the world; and yet show not the least desire to push them a yard outside their own congregation? On Sunday morning and Sunday morning week last, I listened to two sermons which for style, information, and force of argument I believe I never heard anything to equal; and the subjects being so appropriate to the present time of religious stir, to refuse such productions their places in this cheap printing and great reading age is a course that I cannot attempt to reconcile to that law which very justly forbids the hiding of such rare talents. Many ministers would do well if they could when rising in the pulpit change that grave appearance for a deportment which denotes a "Good morning, my friends!" and throw their eyes round the audience with an expression that seems to say, "I intend to say something novel—something that will interest you this morning." In ours as well as other bodies it is too common for preachers to be so absorbed in the subject of the discourse—their attention so riveted on the cause as to all but forget the consequence of it—their eyes being fixed steadily on the manuscript from beginning to end, a style of delivery that would have rendered flat the speeches of Cicero himself.—Faithfully and obediently yours,

PAUL GILL.

MEADOW CHAPEL, GODALMING.

The Committee of the above Chapel have determined to supply the want, which has long been felt, of greater accommodation for their Sunday-schools, and of a room suitable for congregational purposes, meetings, and lectures.
For this purpose upwards of £200 has been raised by the congregation, and another £100 is required that the new building may be opened free from debt in April, 1870.
The Committee now confidently appeal to the Unitarian public to assist them in raising this sum.
Subscriptions will be thankfully received and duly acknowledged by the Secretary.

WANTED, a Situation as Useful Companion or Housekeeper; highest references.—Address FAITH, care of Mr. Horrocks, stationer, New Wandsworth.

LONGTON.—The Unitarian congregation meeting in this town are very desirous to erect a more suitable place of worship than the one they at present have. For a long time they have had to hold their religious services in a room of a public house, situated in a back street. The success of the Unitarian cause is injured, in this part of the country, by the building in which its claims are advocated. It is often said, if there were a chapel instead of a public-house room to meet in, many persons who sympathise with us would attend the services.

There is another consideration which urges the congregation to get a place worthy of the views they hold of the religion of Jesus Christ. At present there is no Sunday-school in connection with the society, as the person who lets the room for the religious services will not allow it to be used for a Sunday-school.

Longton is a rapidly increasing municipal town in the Staffordshire Potteries. It also forms part of the parliamentary borough of Stoke-upon-Trent. Collected around the site of the proposed chapel at a very short distance there is a population of thirty thousand inhabitants; a wide field here presents itself to those who are engaged in teaching the pure and simple doctrines of the Gospel.

The congregation is composed chiefly of working people; they have, as stated above, secured a site, and they have contributed according to their means towards building a place of worship, the cost of which they estimate at about £500.

As the congregation are fully felt that there is a reasonable prospect of much more good being done if they had a chapel of their own, they therefore cast themselves upon the generosity of their Unitarian brethren to assist in erecting one, and they appeal to the kindness of all those who are desirous to promote the success of liberal Christianity and the religious instruction of the young.

The following gentlemen will be Trustees in conjunction with other gentlemen living in the locality:—

George Melly, Esq., M.P., Rev. Brooke Herford, Manchester.
Rev. Benjamin Glover, Crews, Mr. Robert Spears, London.

In addition to the following subscriptions which have been promised, two gentlemen will give £100 providing the remaining sum of (£400) be raised:—

THE UNITARIAN CHAPEL, POOLE.

This neat and commodious Chapel, erected at a cost of £1,200, including also a convenient Schoolroom, has been opened. There is the prospect of a not inconsiderable congregation being gathered were it practicable to secure the services of a zealous and able pastor. The debt which hangs over the place, £310, must be paid before this object can be attained.

The undersigned, having been present at the opening service, and being cognisant of the capabilities of the congregation and its prospects, respectfully recommend the case to the attention and help of the Unitarian body, believing it to be on every account deserving of the assistance asked.

Donations may be forwarded to any of us, or to Mr. Alfred Bainton, Poole.

ON THEIR OWN MERITS,

The WINES of HUNGARY are good, useful, Wines, without forcing upon them, as has been too much the case, a reputation and character beyond their INTRINSIC QUALITIES. There is sufficient diversity of taste in a large population to ensure for the Wines a fair trial and a regular market; and it is fairer to place them well before the public, and let them stand the test of comparison with those of other countries. In the long run this will be best for the interests of the Wines themselves, as they are really good, sound Wines. Perhaps the quality most in demand, and much recommended by doctors, is

CARLOWITZ,

WHICH WE OFFER AT 22s. PER DOZEN, and ask comparison with the HIGHEST PRICED quality of LONDON WINES. We may remark that we were among the VERY FIRST who brought Wines from Hungary seven years ago.

WHAT THE CHURCHES ARE DOING.

The scandals that are from time to time occasioned by clergymen refusing, from real or imagined canonical scruples, to bury the bodies of objectionable parishioners are as common in France as in England. The latest is the case of the priest of Serrigny, who has refused to bury the Sieur Chalumeau, because it was said that he had died from the effects of a fight. In spite of the entreaties of the mayor and the procureur-imperial, the Curé Finney refuses the Church's benedictions to the corpse. Yet, it seems hard that a man should be damned for having been killed. As usual, much indignation has been excited, especially in the minds of practical men, who think that State officials paid by everybody should work for everybody. But why be angry when the remedy is in our own hands? We can easily prevent the clergy from refusing us their aid—by never asking for it.

It is stated that the Pope has prepared a bull, at the instigation of the Jesuits, making known the arrangements he wishes to be carried out during the sitting of the General Council in case of his death, and his instructions for the government of the Church. It seems from this as if infallibility could extend into the future, and it might save much trouble if his Holiness would give "instructions" as to what should be done in all time to come.

The High Church Revival in London, the "war against sin and Satan," is regarded by those who have taken part in it as a great success, and the Church Review, and one or two other papers of the same school, are delighted with it. The John Bull, however, while chronicling the services at length, expresses but a qualified approval of them. The movement was set on foot by the extreme Ritualists, and though a few Evangelical clergymen joined it, the names of the Revs. W. J. E. Bennett, Dr. Littledale, Luke Rivington, R. Liddell, and about a score of other well-known Puseyites, were enough to indicate its character. The special services, which were conducted for twelve days in succession, are estimated to have been attended daily by at least 35,000 persons, many of whom it is said have never been to a place of worship before. The form of service employed, called "The Book of the Mission," contains many extracts from "The People's Hymnal," a "Litany of the Holy Name," a form of service called "The Renewal of Baptismal Vows," a form of confession, and instructions how the penitent shall conduct himself before the priest. Some idea of the style of preaching may be formed from a description of that of a young "mission priest," on the Sunday evening, at All Saints', Margaret-street. Wearing a white surplice, he crossed himself as he entered the pulpit, saying "In the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost." He then, in a loud voice, gave out his text, Lamentations i. 12, from which he preached extempore, and in a most sensational manner for fully an hour. The Primitive Methodists are sometimes thought to be noisy in their discourses, but there are not many of them who could beat him in this respect. The greater part of his sermon was delivered at the top of his voice, and at times he seemed almost frantic. He began by saying, "O my soul, these are the words of thy God, who is speaking to thee;" then to the congregation, "I am not going to tell you to-night anything you did not know before; a mission is not for teaching, but for action." The sufferings of Christ were then depicted in the most exciting language: "There," said he, "is Jesus with his hands tied to the pillar, the soldier is lifting his whip, it is just about to descend upon that sacred back covered with blood. I see him there! Cannot you see him? I can. What was our imagination given to us for, if it was not to bring up such scenes that they might be re-acted before us." Then he spoke of an unheeding world, how men passed by Christ and would not pity him. Sometimes the preacher would turn away from the congregation, and fixing his eyes on the painted picture over the altar, break out in a passionate address to the suffering Saviour. At another time he would bow so low in the pulpit that his head rested on the desk. At the close of the sermon (it was then nine o'clock) he invited those who wished to turn from their evil ways to stay to a Bible-class. On each seat was a paper, headed with a black cross, containing a plan of the services, and at the bottom this sentence: "The Mission Priest will be in the vestry daily from 12 to 1, from 2 to 4, and from 5 to 6, and after the mission service, to see any who may desire to avail themselves of his personal assistance, either for confession or for further individual instruction."

Mr. R. F. Clark, of St. John's College, Oxford, has been obliged to resign the office of Moderator, under circumstances which will not fail to attract the notice of the supporters of Sir John Coleridge's University Tests Bill. Having "left the Church of England," as he stated in a convocation held last week, he considered whether he was or was not bound to retire from the moderatorship, and the conclusion he came to was "that he was justified, both legally and morally, in retaining his office, since a B.C.L., who need not be a member of the Church of England, might be a moderator." His degree, however, was an M.A.; and he found that "it was intended to enforce against him an obsolete statute, by which any Master who would not, when called upon, declare his assent to the Book of Common Prayer might be banished from the precincts of the University." He could not resist this "persecution," and therefore resigned under protest.

At the annual synod of the Scottish Episcopal Church a discussion took place among the bishops on the prayer of a number of petitions asking that a general synod should be summoned to consider whether the privileges of the laity in ecclesiastical administration should not be increased. Bishop Wordsworth was afraid the laity were going too fast, and referred to an influential correspondent in Ireland, who was staggered at the way in which Church matters were being arranged there. With the exception of the Primus, who seemed to be in favour of extending the privileges of the laity, all the bishops indicated an opinion that such a course would be perilous and dangerous at the present time.

Testimonials have been so often given to mere success that they have rather fallen into disrepute. The English Independent, however, reports one which every one will feel was right well deserved. For fifty years two worthy members of the Congregational Church at Worcester have trudged from ten to fifteen miles every Sunday, summer and winter, in all weathers, with absolutely no intermission except that which illness compelled, to gather neglected children into Sunday-schools, and teach them the elements of religious truth and the life and words of the Lord Jesus Christ. This they have done without desire for fee or reward. The members of the congregation to which they belonged, and some of the villagers whom their labours have benefited, have now had the grace to acknowledge the completion of the fiftieth year of service by giving them a "testimonial," a trifling present, yet one which in their position of life was probably not unwelcome. At any rate, we feel, it was something which most of us might with good reason envy.

The directions which the apostle gave to his beloved Timothy as to how he "ought to behave himself in the house of God," would have seemed sadly imperfect to the Rev. Charles Parnell, of St. Margaret's, Liverpool. He has recently issued a series of instructions to his congregation, and some of the observances which he enjoins have not a little perplexed the simple Protestants of his parish. For example—"The people are requested to rise at the entry of the clergy; for they come as ambassadors," &c., &c.; and the congregation, at the conclusion of the service, are to keep their seats till the clergy and the choir have left the church. Further, they are informed that "there is a right and a wrong way of receiving the Blessed Sacrament. No one should attempt to receive the Lord's body between the finger and thumb. The ancient and proper mode is to cross the hands, the right being uppermost, open, and quite flat. The Lord's body will be placed in the palm, and the hands should be raised to the mouth without touching it with the fingers. Communicants should kneel upright, and should not forget to take off their gloves before they come up to the altar; there should be no prostrations while receiving. The chalice should be taken firmly by the knob in the centre of the stem, and not tilted by the foot, which is a very dangerous practice. It should be raised slowly to the lips, and then returned to the priest without any hurrying. To wipe the lips afterwards with a pocket-handkerchief is an irreverence impossible to any who believe they have received the Lord's blood." If this is not puerile superstition, we should like to know what is.

In connection with this we may mention two volumes on "Church Ornaments" and "Church Vestments," by Mrs. Anastasia Dolby, from which one might almost be led to conclude that the Christian religion had much more to do with millinery for the body than with the things of the spirit. According to her every article in the ritualistic costume is symbolical. By the cape, for instance, "holy conversation is represented, therefore it is used by every order. It has a hood above, which marks the joy of heaven. It reaches to the feet, because in good living we must persevere to the end. By the fringes the labour is denoted by which the service of God is consummated. It is open before, because eternal life lies open to the ministers of Christ who lead a holy life." These be pretty fancies; but in the same way it would not be difficult to show that clergymen ought to preach in the old three-cornered cocked hats, the corners symbolising the Trinity, and the whole head-gear representing the Church militant.

A work, too, of a similar character has been published by Mr. M. E. C. Walcott, entitled "Sacred Archeology," by which is meant "all the appendages of the priesthood and the rituals, knobs and bosses, choral pauses in the Psalms; popularies, or consecrated drinking-cups;" "pargettings," "the ornamental plastering on walls;" grave-diggers in the catacombs; torch-bearers; every thing, and every man, in fact, that has had anything to do with matters ecclesiastical. Paradise is sacred; "Hawpulling Towels" are sacred; "Pultog Holes," apertures for scaffolding left in church-walls, are sacred; we have the holy sponge, the holy brush, the holy spoon, the holy voice-tube, and the holy pouch. The work shows what ritualism is tending towards, and what childish folly it would land the churches in, if it had its own way.

The deanery of Ely, having been refused by Canon Dale and Dr. Bateson, has been offered to the Rev. C. Merivale, Rector of Lawford and Chaplain to the House of Commons. It is worth £1,000 a year, which is double the value of the chaplaincy. The richest deanery in England is Durham, its value being £3,000 per annum. Oxford is worth £2,500; Canterbury, York, St. Paul's, Exeter, Lincoln, and Manchester, each £2,000; Bath and Wells, Chester, Ely, Gloucester, Hereford, Lichfield, Ripon, and Salisbury, each £1,000. The value of St. David's is said to be only £250 a year.

Except in Rome, perhaps, the heavens seem scarcely to smile just now on Catholicism. The Czechs, it appears, are not satisfied with the state of the Bohemian Church, wanting, among other things, that a general synod should meet at Prague every three years for the discussion of Church matters, and that the Czech language should be substituted for Latin in the religious service. Before their bishops set out for the Council they were urged to support these demands in it, and it is stated that if they are not granted, there is reason to believe that the inferior clergy will combine with the national party to construct a Bohemian Church distinct from that of Rome, for the popular mind is so agitated on the subject that it is quite ready to come to an open rupture with the ecclesiastical authorities.

At a meeting of the Liberation Society it was stated by Mr. Miall that it was not their intention to recommend any direct or positive measure concerning the Church during the next Session, but to wait until they could deal with the whole question of disestablishment and disendowment of the English and Scotch Churches.

A fortnight ago we referred to the speech of the rector of Whitby at an anti-Temple meeting, at which a memorial was adopted, and afterwards forwarded to Mr. Gladstone; and our readers, no doubt, have seen the sharp cut which he gave to the promoters, by informing them that he had been led to make some inquiry on the subject, and had learnt that the meeting was "misdescribed," having been, not as was represented to him, "a meeting of the town of Whitby at all, but called in a school-room, addressed principally or exclusively by the rector and other clergy, and never attended at any one time by more than sixteen persons." From the Fork Herald we learn that of the sixteen who composed the "public meeting," six were clergymen, one was a churchwarden, one a Scripture-reader, two were newspaper reporters and one was a personal attendant upon the rector, so that what was described as the "inhabitants of Whitby" numbered five persons—reminding one of the famous "three tailors of Tooley-street."

WHAT IS SAYING ON CHURCH MATTERS.

The Telegraph is struck with the mental commotion now pervading the world of speculation and religious thought. Never has religious teaching awakened more profound curiosity, nor have men more fearlessly and more anxiously asked the ever-recurring questions respecting the great hereafter. America has shown the force of the impulse in her crowd of new churches, in her mushroom-like growth of new religious creeds, and in the wonderful uprise of Mormonism, with its extraordinary demand on the spirit of self-sacrifice, frugality, and industry. As M. Prevost-Paradol has been telling us, the Roman Catholic Church of France, so much hated before the great revolution, so much despised after it, has regained such power over the "bourgeoisie" that "it is deemed now, in provincial life, a blemish and a fault, not only if you are the opponent of the Church, but even if you are not reckoned amongst its supporters and friends." In England the great wave set in motion by fractarianism is still moving, and Ritualism is one token of its force, the disestablishment of the Irish Church another; so is the protest which the Roman Catholics are making against secular education, and to which Bishop Ullathorne has given utterance at Birmingham. Rome proclaims that she is under the influence of the same force, by summoning for the first time during 300 years an Ecumenical Council, and by inviting non-Catholics to return, confess their errors, and rejoin the Church undivided by the Reformation. The Greek Church is joining in the general movement, by expressing through her chief Patriarch a desire for reunion with the Christendom of the West. Germany is to hold a great festival in honour of Luther; Evangelical Protestantism is to spend the month of December in prayer, that the Pope may be brought to see the error of his ways, and the Ecumenical Council be led to affirm Evangelical truth. In a word, we see in all directions a new spirit of inquiry and a new consciousness of the common faith; while each branch of the Christian Church stands stubbornly on the defensive, shrinking from the bare idea that it should surrender its special tenets. Yet, while each thus offers itself as the centre round which all the others may rally, the very conflict between the arrogance of separate authority and the professed desire for alliance, shows how strong is the reawakening instinct of life and unity throughout Christendom, even to its remotest borders.

The Jesuits are scarcely showing, in some of their proceedings, the worldly wisdom with which they are credited. Surely they must know that a work, which has just issued from the press of the Civiltà Cattolica, containing passages like these that follow can but excite disgust in the minds of men of the least cultivation:

"Only Catholicism could produce a Dante, a Tasso, a Galileo, a Columbus. The anti-Catholic sects can do nothing but state paradoxes and sow ignorance. What has natural philosophy been from the times of Newton till our own? A myth. What is Newton's theory of attraction? The height of extravagance. Who are the most thought-confusing sophists in the world? The astronomers with their attraction of gravitation, and the natural philosophers with their mechanical theory of heat. When will an orthodox and sensible philosophy again arise? When the theories of gravitation and affinity, the central fire and Humboldt's 'Kosmos' are banished to the region of chimeras. A single man rises superior to all others, of whatever class, and whatever station they may be. He is Pius IX., Rome's great priest. His word has authority, and before him the mighty men of the earth and the wise men of this world shall bow their heads."

The London correspondent of the Cambridge Independent says:

"There was a time when baronets were rare amongst the Dissenters; but as the love of religious equality extended, Nonconformists obtained a share of titular distinctions, and several can now write 'Bart.' after their names. At present the peerage seems fatal. The only Lords I know—save one who preaches—who have attended chapels, are Earl Lovelace, Earl Zetland, and Lord Belper, who are Unitarians, but they rarely go now, I understand, to the chapels of their sect. Mr. J. P. Heywood, who refused a peerage the other day, is a Unitarian; and Lord Houghton is sometimes amongst the attendants at Mr. Martineau's services. But a peer who did not go to church would require, as things are, great force of will and some strong conviction. Lord Overstone's father was at one time a Dissenting minister, and to the last remained a Nonconformist; but his Lordship is understood to be anything but proud of the fact, and would probably wince at any reference to his father as the 'Rev. Jones Loyd.' The retiring Lord Mayor of London, now a baronet, is a Unitarian Dissenter, and his successor is an Independent. Nobody cares for such details in civic matters, but they serve to illustrate the altered feeling of our time."

We learn from the Rochdale Observer that "spiritualism" is spreading far and wide, not only among the highly cultured, but also among the most religious of the middle and the working classes, and it has a drift and purpose of a very sweeping and revolutionary character. "It aims at nothing less than the complete removal and burial of all the orthodox creeds—the tripersonality of God, the vicarious atonement, salvation by substitution, justification by faith alone, the resurrection of the cast-off body, the destruction of this world, the eternity of wickedness and misery, and every particle and phase of priestcraft and sectcraft. It propounds the simple truths, that there is one God, however variously men may see Him, that God is all-loving and all-wise, that true religion consists in constantly doing the will of the Good Father as it is individually perceived, that every human being will, sooner or later, by progressive stages, be saved from whatever evil, error, and misery he may have contracted and brought upon himself, and that the church, or spiritual temple of the Lord, is the human mind, considered both individually and universally. In short, spiritualism aims at the progressive improvement of humanity in all its faculties and duties." Large gatherings of people assembled at Rhodes, near Middleton, two Sundays ago, to receive information from the spirit world, conveyed through a Mr. Jackson and a Mr. Johnston, "speaking mediums." After addresses from, or rather through them, questions were put and answered. Among them were these:—Will any human being be lost for ever? What is the true idea of the church? Is any faith of value without obedience? It was answered that no one would be lost for ever, that the true idea of the church was that of the Universal Church, every human being, irrespective of creed or country, who had in him a spark of love for the right, being a member of this church, and that no faith without obedience was of any avail to human well-being. The idea that none of God's creatures will be tormented to eternity kindled the odium theologium in one or two minds, but the resistance which they offered to the view of the ultimate triumph of good over evil, "was crushed," we are told, "with tremendous force."

Lord Shaftesbury and the Bishop of Ripon have been making speeches, the former in Dorsetshire and the latter at Huddersfield, on the position and prospects of the Church. Both, of course, denounce Ritualism and Broad-Churchism, and hold up their own "ism" as the one thing needful for England. The bishop keeps a watchful eye on the movements of the Liberation Society. That an assault upon the Church is imminent he has no doubt, but he bids his fellow-Churchmen take courage. "They were not disestablished and disendowed yet, and by the help of God, they never would be." Lord Shaftesbury deemed it necessary to defend his brief flirtation with Dr. Pusey in the Temple affair. If, he said, the Pope himself were to come to him to ask for his assistance "to maintain the integrity of the Gospel," he would give him his hand or even his arm. They could work together up to a certain point, "although they might be at loggerheads immediately afterwards." As the Manchester Guardian observes, "here is something for the imagination to dwell upon—Lord Shaftesbury and the Man of Sin running some hapless Broad-Churchman to earth, and, that business settled, proceeding forthwith to determine which of the two should have the privilege of extinguishing the other."

The Greek Patriarch at Constantinople has addressed a letter to the Archbishop of Canterbury which contrasts favourably with the two that have come from the Pontiff at Rome, who styles himself the Vicar of Christ. The Patriarch terms the Anglican Primate a "brother in Christ," and the Church over which he presides a "God-beloved fold." There is a tinge of oriental exaggeration about the complimentary expressions used, but this was to be expected from the manners of a country where the customary formula in addressing a respectable stranger is, "God is first, and you are the next." The Patriarch says he has examined the Prayer-book which the Archbishop had sent him, and while he finds in it much to commend, he takes exception to the Thirty-nine Articles, and thinks it is not quite consistent with the objects of a prayer-book to employ it as a medium for condemning other Churches, as is done in the 19th Article!

PAPAL INFALLIBILITY "A PROTESTANT INVENTION."

THE Rev. Llewelyn Davies sends the following well-timed letter to the Pall Mall:

"When the development of doctrine is rapid, it is almost inevitable that catechisms should grow obsolete. Let me invite the attention of your Roman Catholic readers to some of the teaching in a catechism of the present generation which appears already to require revision. This work, entitled the 'Controversial Catechism,' is recommended by Archbishop Hughes and four bishops, and has attained in less than twenty-five years a circulation of 24,000. The Tablet, which speaks as the organ of Archbishop Manning, only the other day (Oct. 16) commended this catechism as follows:—'Its large circulation has not exceeded its merits. As a controversial catechism, equally well adapted for the instruction of Catholics and Protestants, it is all that could be desired.' Those who look into it for instruction on the question of Papal infallibility are thus taught:—'Q. Must not Catholics believe the Pope in himself to be infallible?—A. This is a Protestant invention: it is no article of the Catholic faith; no decision of his can oblige under pain of heresy, unless it be received and enforced by the teaching body; that is, by the Bishops of the Church.' (Chapter ix. section ii.)

"The same number of the Tablet contains an article headed 'Pontifical Prerogatives,' in which it contends for 'the Church's power in temporals—the power, e.g., of deposing kings under certain conditions.' 'The Popes,' it says, 'have never spoken less severely of the first Gallican article, which denies this power, than of the remaining three. All which can be said is, that they have not sought to exercise the power in question under circumstances which render its exercise impossible. Surely this obvious fact cannot possibly be alleged as a proof, either that the power has not been divinely given, or that Catholics are not bound to believe in its existence.' But in the catechism Catholics are instructed as follows:

"'Q. What if a General Council or Papal Consistory should undertake to depose a king or absolve his subjects from their obedience?—A. No Catholic is bound to submit to such a decree. Indeed, every Catholic may renounce, upon oath, any such doctrine, and this without the least breach of Catholic principle.—Q. Can the Pope absolve subjects from their allegiance on account of the heresy or schism of their king?—A. No; such dispensation or absolution is null; Catholics are still at liberty to defend their king and country at the hazard of their lives, even against the Pope himself.' (Ibid.)

"It would surely shock Archbishop Manning to learn that such rank 'Gallicanism' as this is being taught under authority, both in America and in Great Britain, as sound Catholic doctrine."

AMERICAN NOTES.

Father Hyacinthe has written a letter to the Rev. L. W. Bacon, of Williamsburg, which is to serve as a preface to a translation which he is about to publish of the Father's sermons into English. In it he says he continues faithful to his Church and faith, but has protested against the excesses which dishonour them. He is none the less sensible of the interest felt in other churches as to what he may say or do within the pale of Catholicism. "For that matter," he adds, "I have never deemed that the Christian communions that have separated from Rome have been disinherited of the Holy Ghost, and without a part in the infinite work of the preparation for the Kingdom of God." Whatever may be the differences separating the various Christian bodies, they are all, Father Hyacinthe considers, labouring in common for the Church of the future.

A New York paper states that the Father intends to start a paper in Paris, to be called Le Chrétien, which shall be both religious and political in its character.

The New York Protestant Churchman mentions that the Hon. and Rev. Baptist Noel, in a letter to the Rev. C. H. Malcolm, of Newport, thus writes in favour of open communion:

"To refuse communion to any of his disciples who obeyed his commands as far as they knew them was an offence against him and against brotherly love, not known, as I believe, in the apostolic churches. No person in that day could manifest obedience to the Lord's command while refusing to be baptised, but many who are not immersed as believers now do so; and to exclude them from his table has always appeared to me to be an offence against him, partaking of the nature of schism."

The Rev. Henry Ward Beecher sometimes gets as well as gives a thrust, as appears from the following which is related by a correspondent of the Advance:

"One evening the exercises ran into the form of personal experience, and several of the brethren told of their spiritual enjoyment. Mr. Beecher suggested that this testimony was all very well, but that the account of such smooth sailing did not at all edify as much as the log book of some mariner who had harder navigation, and he said they would like to hear from some brother who had been called to contend with a very proud disposition, or a rough, crabbed temper! 'I like that suggestion,' exclaimed one of the deacons; 'Bro. Beecher, suppose you lead off!' It is said that Mr. Beecher took the remark very kindly, reckoning it only appropriate change for some of his own home-thrusts."

From the statements made by a correspondent of the Times, it looks as if Salt City was approaching a crisis, and that not merely in one way but in several. A combination of causes is apparently sapping the strength of the sect. The gentiles threaten them through the railroad, divisions are springing up among themselves, and though the richness of the soil at Utah furnishes ready resources for almost any increase of population, the growth of the community, in the absence of sanitary arrangements, is beginning to tell severely on the public health, and the mortality among children is very great. David and Alexander Smith, too, sons of the prophet Joseph, are preaching a hot crusade against polygamy, denouncing Brigham Young himself in his own city as "foul, false, and corrupt," but though people are somewhat shaken in their faith as to the purity of the institution, it has a strong hold on vested interests. The wives detest polygamy, but dread destitution. A keen inquisitorial supervision is maintained over the city by Young and his coadjutors, who go from house to house prying, questioning, and if they observe anything that does not please them throw out alarming hints of "cutting off from the church." This "cutting off" is a serious thing, for it means no work to be had of Mormons, no help, no charity, no pity. Notwithstanding the irritation thus created, the writer's conclusion is that, though the Mormons quarrel bitterly among themselves, "any severe handling of them by Americans would produce a large party ready to resist to the death if they could preserve their institutions at all; they are fanatics by nature and choice, and would fight with the desperation of fanatics." He looks more hopefully to the operation of Christian missions, of which the American Episcopal Church has successfully been the pioneer.

The New York Herald declares that there never existed but one Mormon Irishman, and a Mormon Irishwoman is something totally unknown to naturalists.

Sojourner Truth, a black woman, who was for forty years a slave, and of whom we once heard Mrs. Stowe give a most interesting and touching account, attended a prayer meeting the other night at Mr. Beecher's church, when she was invited by him to make some remarks to the congregation. "Whereupon," says the New York Independent, "she rose and spoke for about half an hour in a vein of mingled sense, pathos, and wit, by which all who heard her were both profited and pleased. The recital of her religious experiences was a treat much above the common confessions of prayer-meeting speeches. Her unique discourse will not be forgotten by those who heard it."

In a speech at the meeting of the Canadian Wesleyan Missionary Society, the Rev. W. M. Punshon said:

"An American was once boasting to an Italian about the beauty and greatness of his country. They had greener fields, and bluer skies, and louder thunder, and 'forkeder' lightning than any other country. 'But,' said the Italian, 'you have no Vesuvius.' 'Well, no,' said the American, 'we have no Vesuvius, but we have a Niagara that could put it out in five minutes!' And so there is no fire of human passion that cannot be put out by those healing streams that issue from the fountain of life."

From the Rev. Newman Hall's account, the Free Episcopal Church of America, in its government, partakes of the Congregational element almost as much as of the Episcopal. The heads of families, or seat-holders, in a parish, constitute the "parish." On Easter Monday they elect from eight to fourteen persons as elders, or churchwardens, who constitute the parish vestry, and do the work of the "deacons" of an Independent church. Of these there are two "wardens" specially to act as between the minister and the people. The vestry determines on repairs, levy rates, vote supplies, and make all other church arrangements. They, as representing the people, nominate the clergyman. At a general meeting of the "parish" three or four lay representatives are elected, who with the minister are delegates to the annual diocesan convention. All clergymen attend the convention and vote, whether they have a parish or not. This assembly, in which the lay element greatly predominates, is presided over by the bishop, and determines all matters relating to that particular diocese. This council elects the bishop when a vacancy occurs. It also sends four clerical and four lay deputies to represent the diocese in the Lower House of the triennial General Assembly of the Church. The bishops sit apart with closed doors, and constitute the Upper House. They can veto any measure passed by the Lower House. Questions affecting the whole Church are here discussed, and no change can be made unless the measure receives the sanction of both Houses. The bishops hold consecrations, ordinations, and confirmations. They superintend the diocese by advising rather than by any exercise of absolute authority; and they have no power to interfere in the administration of parishes. It cannot therefore be said that the "clergy" constitute the "church" of the Episcopalians. The equal membership of the laity is fully recognised. Pastors are appointed by electors chosen by each congregation; and every question is discussed and determined in open assembly, where the clergy have only a preponderating influence by superiority of wisdom and moral influence.

There has recently been considerable excitement in Cincinnati concerning the use of the Bible in the common schools, the Roman Catholics, of course, opposing it, as also the Jews, and some who hold what are called "advanced" opinions in religious matters. In consequence of their representations, the city Board of Education a short time ago passed, by five more than a majority of its members, an order limiting the instruction given in the schools to secular instruction. This has caused a great deal of popular excitement, and what the result is likely to be we have not yet heard.

In several of the American papers of late we have met with notes of alarm at the growing power of Romanism, especially in New York. This, in the Liberal Christian, comes from a quarter where we should have least expected anything of the kind:

"Crossing Boston Common the other morning, an Irishman of fifty years of age, with the materials of a picture-framer under his arm, saluted us suddenly with 'Good morning, your Reverence; isn't it Bishop Williams?' 'No,' we modestly replied. 'But it is Bishop Williams, I'm sure,' he insisted. 'No,' we reassured him. 'Well, but ain't you a Catholic?' he urged. 'No! not in your sense,' we said. 'And why ain't you a Catholic?' he screamed, raising his voice in a very excited manner. 'Didn't our blessed Lord say, 'All power is given me in heaven and earth,' and didn't he say to Peter, 'On this rock I build my Church?' etc. Not feeling inclined to a theological argument with a stranger, on the public common, we were passing on, when he discharged after us a volley of abuse of the most excited and exciting character. A few moments would have raised a mob, and a little of his fanaticism, added to by others' sympathy, would have subjected us to injury as well as abuse. May we not live to see the Roman Catholic Church resuming its character of inquisitor and persecutor in our country yet? This was one sliver from the coming bonfire!'"

Dr. Bushnell, in a recent sermon, entitled "God's Thoughts fit Bread for Children," thus refers to the duty of ministers to preach to the young:

"Is it not our privilege and duty, as preachers of Christ, to do more preaching to children? I think of nothing in my own ministry with so much regret and so little respect as I do of my omissions here. We get occupied with great and high subjects that require a handling too heavy and deep for children, and become so fooled in our estimate of what we do that we call it coming down when we undertake the preaching to children; whereas it is coming up, rather, out of the subterranean hells, darknesses, intricacies, dungeon-life profundities of old, grown-up sin, to speak to the bright daylight creatures of trust and sweet affinities and easy conviction. And to speak to these fitly, so as not to thrust in Jesus on them as by force, but have him win his own dear way, by his childhood, waiting for his cross, tenderly, purely, and without art—oh! how fine, how very precious the soul equipment it will require of us! I think I see it now clearly: we do not preach well to adults because we do not preach, or learn how to preach, to children. Jesus did not forget to be a child; but, if he had been a child with us, we should probably have missed the sight of him. God's world contains grown-up people and children together; our world contains grown-up people only. And preaching only to these, who are scarcely more than half the total number, it is much as if we were to set our ministry to a preaching only to bachelors. We dry up in this manner, and our thought wizens in a certain pomp of pretence that is hollow and not Gospel. The very certain fact is that our schools of theology will never make qualified preachers till they discover the existence of children."

TOTAL DISESTABLISHMENT NEXT.

WE are glad to find that among all the various organs which represent the real strength of Nonconformity, there is only one opinion as to the necessity of now at once pressing upon the public mind the whole question of Establishment. There is to be no more contending about side issues, no more nibbling at exceptional abuses. For a moment it seemed as if Sir WATKIN WILLIAMS's motion with regard to the Church in Wales would prove too tempting an opportunity to be passed by of once more taking the Church of England at a specially weak point. But the leaders of the Liberation Society—and they comprise the real leaders of Nonconformity—have wisely resolved to spend no more strength in assaults upon the outworks, but to proceed against the citadel itself, and openly proclaim to the world that what we ask is that religion be left to work itself out freely by its own forces and associations, in all churches and in all sects alike, the State neither helping nor hindering any.

This is not indeed an entirely new thing, inasmuch as this is the principle on which the great liberal-religious movements of the past twenty years have by a considerable number been based. But it has hardly been put prominently forward. The reforms which have occupied us have all had immediate practical claims of their own. The abolition of Church-rates, the opening of Universities, the disestablishment of the Irish Church, have forced themselves upon the mind of the nation by broad, strong arguments of fair play and common sense, which have made it needless to talk much about abstract principles. It has no doubt been clearly seen that the disestablishment of the Anglican Church was the ultimate object at which a large number of those who took part in the agitation of these questions were aiming, but it appeared too far off to be worth saying much about. So far as it has been brought forward it has seemed almost a source of weakness. The intention of eventually claiming complete disestablishment has been adduced as the reductio ad absurdum of such movements towards religious equality, and flung back upon their advocates as an object the mere statement of which was sufficient to discredit their cause. It has been the last defence of indefensible ecclesiastical wrongs, that their removal was sought only as a stepping-stone to some ultimate revolutionary measure of perfect religious equality. This, at any rate, must be so no more. Henceforward it is the cardinal principle which we put forward, to which we ask attention, and which we claim to have fully carried in one national action. We will no longer fight the battle as one against special abuses. We take our stand upon the ground that the whole system of establishments is a wrong and a mischief; an injustice to those outside, and an injury to religion itself.

That the first effect may be to alienate some of those with whom we have of late been working side by side, we are quite aware. But we can afford to wait now, and to work not for next year, but if needful, for the next generation. We do not indeed think the struggle will be so long as that. We shall all work better and argue better with the broad, clear principle, distinctly kept before us. Moreover, we are persuaded that an open avowal of this purpose will be the best for securing a fair public consideration of the principles at issue—even from its opponents. Even the Conservative Globe, commenting upon the announced policy of the Liberation Society, acknowledges that it is at least frank and courageous, and says that the question of the union of Church and State has never yet really been discussed on its merits. And the same paper concludes with a sentiment, which we are sure will find a cordial response in many quarters, "We are glad that the Liberation Society has made up its mind no longer to tease and torment Parliament by the pursuit of a nagging policy."

That it will be a long and severe struggle needs no gift of prophecy to tell. The English Establishment is much more deeply rooted in the traditions of English life, and is far more closely intertwined with the whole fabric of English society, than was the case with the sister Establishment in Ireland. The Church of England, whatever may be its anomalies, at any rate has not any such preponderance of abuses as had forced upon every statesman of mark for a generation past the conviction that the Irish Church was too monstrous to be maintained. And on the other hand, it has a fair account to give of work doing, if not done. Moreover, as soon as it comes to really taking sides, a good many of our seeming allies will decamp. Most of the clergymen who are now uttering brave words about the only hope of the Church being in separation from the State will by-and-by find their Liberationist courage oozing out at their finger-ends. A few, like Dr. PUSEY and Archdeacon DENISON, may be too deeply and explicitly committed to draw back, but the rest will return to the old camp and fight for Establishment as if it were the very ark of God. Nor, on the whole, is this to be much regretted. The fact is, that the professed eagerness which is shown in some clerical quarters for cutting the Church loose from the State is rather damaging to the cause of disestablishment, because its aim is confessedly to diminish, not to increase, liberty, and to gain greater power in dealing with heresy. True; yet this is after all only another argument for our conclusion, though from a direction opposite to our own. The religious life of men can only work healthily when it works freely, and chooses its associations, and organises its worship and its government according to the life that is in it. If it is composed of men who hold certain views very strongly and earnestly, you do not liberalise them by forcing them to march in the same line, and to assume a certain responsibility for each other by joint membership in one religious organisation. As a matter of fact, you embitter their repulsion by forcing them into an artificial union. We believe that the antagonisms in the Church of England would be immediately lessened and the sooner reconciled if every congregation were left to its own independent action. So, quite as much as we ask justice to those outside the Church do we seek to set free the now cramped and swathed life which is within the Church itself. Let us be twitted, as we shall be, as political dissenters, our aim is really a mighty religious reform—the abolition of a system which injures Religion even more than it cripples the Church, and even more than it dishonours Dissent.

REBELLION AGAINST ROME.

It is generally acknowledged by those who have had opportunities of forming a fair judgment, that Pio Nono, though a good, kindly old man, is one of but narrow culture, and who has little acquaintance with society at large, having passed his life before his elevation to the episcopate in a monastery; and his impolicy in summoning the Council which, mainly for the gratification of his vanity, is to meet next month, is daily becoming more apparent. As Antonelli, with his usual sagacity, foresaw would be the case, it has set in motion questions which, for the power of the Papacy and the interests of the Romish Church at large, had better have been left at rest.

Notwithstanding the urgent entreaties of Bishop Ullathorpe, and some others in this country, that until the reports of the Council are issued no opinion should be formed respecting the subjects that are to be discussed, the statements of the Civiltà Cattolica, the organ of the Vatican, have made it sufficiently clear that two of the leading objects for which cardinals and bishops are being brought together, at such great expense and loss of precious time, from all parts of the world, are, to raise into dogmas, on the acceptance of which salvation depends, the personal infallibility or practical deification of the Pope, and the bodily assumption of the Virgin into heaven.

It is understood to have been already arranged, though the result will be represented as dictated by the immediate inspiration of the Holy Ghost, that the former of these dogmas is to be proposed by Archbishop Manning, who in leaving Protestantism seems to have left his reasoning powers behind him, and given himself over, heart and soul, to something very like idolatry. He has become a Papist of the Papists; and before starting for Rome, addressed a pastoral letter to his clergy, in which he tries to justify the position he will there have to assume—that "the Pope, the universal doctor and teacher of the Church, cannot err"—and expresses his conviction that the affirmation of this dogma by the Council "will prove a bond of union to the faithful," "place the Pontifical Acts of the last three hundred years beyond cavil," and "bring out more vividly than ever the only alternative proposed to the human intellect—Rationalism or Faith." In this he may show himself a most devoted son of the Church, but certainly not a very wise, nor even a very well instructed one. And men who have been much longer connected with it, and more thoroughly understand both its history and its working, so far from agreeing with him in his doctrine and the results which he anticipates from it, contemplate its proclamation with alarm, and are openly and decidedly testifying against it.

The first note of opposition came from Mr. Ffoulkes, who some fourteen or fifteen years ago left the Church of England and went over to Rome. His pamphlet entitled "The Church's Creed or Crown's Creed," which we noticed soon after its appearance nine months ago, and which has been translated into Italian, put the case so clearly and forcibly that not only was his publication condemned by the Congregation of the Index, but Archbishop Manning had recourse to the extreme step of refusing him absolution, and suspending him from the sacraments of the Church, unless he signed a sort of retractation, which he refused to do.

The one among the French bishops who has been considered to be most in favour of holding the Council, Monseigneur Dupanloup, before setting out to be present at it, addressed a letter to the clergy of his diocese, in which he says that a declaration of the personal infallibility of the Pope would be inopportune at the present time, because it would be useless and dangerous; would drive schismatics and heretics still further from the Church, their restoration to which ought not to be despaired of; would provoke the mistrust even of Catholic Governments, and would revive the hatred of the Pontifical Power. The Bishop of Marseilles agrees with his brother prelate as to the "prudence with which it is necessary to consider questions that have been raised so inopportune." And the Archbishop of Paris is apparently prepared to take his stand on Gallicanism, and protest against "compelling people to believe, on pain of damnation, what they have never believed before."

In other parts of the Continent, the spirit of alarm and opposition is still more distinctly manifested. In Italy the Marquis de Villamarina, a man of high character and intelligence, in a letter to Father Hyacinthe, strongly protests against the tinkering to which it is supposed the faith of his Church will be subjected by the Council, and thinks it time to lift up a voice against those who would "denaturalise the religion of Christ, and make a traffic of it," who "seek to turn the truths of Christianity and the Gospel into lies and darkness." In Baden, a "Society of Catholics" has been formed to "resist the aggressions of Rome," and is establishing branches throughout Rhenish Prussia: At Fulda nineteen German bishops met, and issued a letter, in which, as among the rumours that are in circulation about the objects of the Council, but which they cannot believe to be true, they give these:

"People accuse the Holy Father of wishing, under party influence, to make use of the Council exclusively in order to augment more than is proper the power of the Apostolic See, to change the old and true constitution of the Church, and to erect, in fact, a spiritual sovereignty incompatible with Christian liberty. Men do not fear to apply the name of partisan to the head of the Church and the episcopacy, an outrage hitherto confined to the declared enemies of the Church."

And one of the most celebrated German Catholic scholars, J. Frohschammer, has just published a pamphlet concerning the Council, in which he thus plainly delivers himself:

"The time seems to be come for speaking freely on the infallibility of the Catholic, or rather of the already Papal Church, as it is most important that educated Catholics should make up their minds about the value of a dogmatic proclamation, establishing the infallibility of the Pope, by the bishops assembled at Rome in a General Council—that is, by the hierarchical Church itself. As they are subject to error, no declaration of theirs with respect to the Pope can be binding on the consciences of Catholics. Indeed, if the assembled bishops declare so very fallible a Pope infallible, they will only prove how vain are their own pretences of infallibility even when they meet in a General Council. It follows that whatever decisions on other subjects this Council may be led by its loyalty to Rome to pronounce cannot be considered as divinely inspired. Its encroachments on the rights of states and nations, its denunciations of the science and culture of modern times, are of no authority, nor can its sanction change the heavy burden which Rome has laid upon the minds of the people into a divine or Christian ordinance."

A still more remarkable work which the Pope's project has called forth is "Janus," the production of two or more from among the learned and thoughtful Catholic theologians of Germany, who indulge the hope, a vain one it seems to us, that liberalism and priestism, scientific and religious progress and a system of spiritual despotism like that of Rome, may be reconciled. This work, however, is too important to be merely described at the close of an article, and we must reserve our notice of it for another occasion.

Meanwhile, these illustrations of the kind of spirit which the action of the Vatican has called forth may serve to show that, though no doubt the Ultramontanes will be strong enough in the Council to decree whatever dogmas they fix beforehand to be inspirations of the Holy Ghost, it will not be without resolute opposition from the more learned and cultivated Bishops, and it may be not without such a feeling of disgust being excited in the minds of some as will lead them to shake off the bondage of Rome altogether, to seek for full religious freedom.

THE HIGH CHURCH REVIVAL.

A correspondent of the Pall Mall Gazette, who "can listen with almost equal pleasure to a Roman Catholic, a Baptist, or a Unitarian so long as they exhibit that rarest of gifts" powerful eloquence, was attracted to the "combined assault on Satan" which we have referred to in "What the Churches are Doing," by a report in the papers that he should hear eloquence rivalling that of "Wesley, Whitfield, or Father Hyacinthe;" and some portions of his description are worth giving.

He found an audience belonging to the thoroughly respectable class, with many ladies of course, and a large number of clergymen. Presently, a gentleman appeared in the pulpit, dressed in some tight-fitting black garment, and after due preparation began his sermon. "A sentence or two was enough," says the writer, "to show that I was not in the presence of one of the good old humdrum preachers of my recollection. The favourite pulpit orator of my undergraduate days was a gentleman who used to settle his spectacles firmly and elaborately, and then clutch his sermon with an air of dogged determination, as though it did not want to be read and he was resolved to read it; his only gesture was an occasional twitch at his shirt-collar, and though he preached excellent sense, made no more attempt at grace than the clerk who reads an indictment for murder." But this one "disdained none of the appliances of his art. He raised his hand to heaven and spoke in tones of impassioned appeal; he stretched out his arms and indulged in a sarcastic imitation of the professorial air of some imaginary infidel lecturer; he leant upon his elbows, and almost resting his head upon them, addressed us in the easy colloquial manner; he sprang up again, brought down his arms with emphasis, and shouted till he strained his voice; he flourished his Bible in the air, or clasped it vehemently to his breast; nay, at one time he fairly shook his fist in our faces, and told us that we (that is, certain hypothetical sinners) were fools! fools!! fools!!! Not Chatham himself when he rivalled Garrick, no French nor American orator, could possibly be more animated in his gestures or go through more violent physical exercise; but, to speak frankly, the energy was rather more obvious than the art. Really good speaking implies the power of dwelling upon one strain; the abrupt and incessant changes of our preacher seemed to indicate not an intense earnestness so much as a sort of nervous restlessness. Whitfield, no doubt, like every genuine orator, would heighten the effects of his earnest passages by bits of familiarity or playfulness; but to be incessantly oscillating between the two shows a want of sustained power. Our preacher began by straining his voice and muscles to their full pitch in almost the very first sentences, instead of gradually rising with the rising excitement of his hearers. Indeed, though his language was far more fervent and more grammatical, the manner reminded me less of the models mentioned in the report I had read than of such oratory as I have heard from the distinguished Protestant champion, Mr. Murphy, of riotous reputation."

In regard to the preacher's matter, the general topic of it was the Bible, and the duty of reading it in a proper spirit. "The conception which he took of his task may be best understood by imagining him placed upon a hustings, the opposite portion of which was filled by the conventional infidel, with a cheering crowd below. The great point of the sermon was ridicule of those presumptuous and conceited persons who fall into the sin of intellectual pride. It was they who were apostrophised as fools, fools, fools!—words which were obviously used in the theological sense, and therefore by no means offensive, even if the preacher had not described himself also as a miserable fool. He chaffed them (I can use no other word) by exclaiming, You are wonderfully learned, aren't you? You have your criticism, and your scientific methods, and your profound investigations, haven't you? You profess to pick and choose, and to call Solomon's Song the questionable love poetry of some licentious old Jew, and to say that this book is spurious and that is doubtful; a third is full of forgeries, and—(such was the apparent inference), you are a set of fools for your pains. Then he made his man of straw declare, with the charming frankness generally exhibited by blackhearted traitors as interpreted in their opponents' rhetoric, that God might rule his body, that God might dispose of his soul, but that God shouldn't have anything to say to his intellect. Infidels, it appears, have an objection to moral crimes; but they insist upon the liberty of committing mental crimes, that is to say, of thinking differently from the orthodox. The man of straw being flogged, the Protestant had a turn of denunciation. This variety of error was symbolised by a lady who had once told our preacher that she knew she was right on a certain point because she had prayed to be enlightened before deciding upon it; to which the preacher had replied with a good deal of force that he had also prayed to be enlightened, and had come to a directly opposite conclusion. From this he inferred that the right of private judgment amounted to a claim of every individual to be an infallible pope in his own person. Our proper course, it seems, is to discover on any doubtful point what is the opinion which has been adopted by the unanimous consent of the Church, and to submit our proud intellects to that decision. Instead of daring to criticise for ourselves we should search Tertullian and Cyprian, and the fathers of our own Church, and discover what is the view which they have all sanctioned; and then he said with bitter sarcasm, "It is just possible, just barely possible, that all these saints and martyrs and prophets may be right, and we poor presumptuous mortals wrong." If we haven't Tertullian at hand, doubtless the preacher would be ready to enlighten us. He did not, however, explain what we were to do if the saints and martyrs fell foul of each other, nor how to define the Catholic Church so as to find a unanimous and consistent body. However, the point was that we were to bow down and humble ourselves in the dust (and, suiting the word to the action, he almost sank out of sight in the pulpit) before the Church—whatever the Church may be. All this was enforced with occasional bits of real eloquence, more frequently with a vigorous straining after eloquence, with vehement appeals to his Maker, with abrupt drops into the conversational and extremely familiar style, with taunts, irony, indignation, and occasional but not very daring touches of humour.

I had no objection to the frivolity of the argument. As everybody in the church was, of course, a believer, perhaps it mattered little what was the nature of the assaults. But I rather wondered that there should be arguments at all. The infidel would only have smiled at the naïveté of a reasoner who assumed as the first principle and groundwork of his whole argument that the voice of the Church was the voice of God, and that he, the said reasoner, was the voice of the Church; and would be rather amused at a person who puts forward such astounding claims charging another with wicked arrogance for disputing them. But still less could I understand the value of such preaching to believers. The preacher said in substance, "These infidels are a set of impious, scandalous, blasphemous wretches, who ought to be humbled to the earth." If he had added, "Let us go and burn one of them at Smithfield," I could have understood his logic. But as he seemed to be an amiable and fairly educated man, who would doubtless repudiate persecution, his inarticulate shout of rage against absent people seemed singularly pointless. Certainly it was not calculated to call forth bursts of pious emotion, or to humble the hard-hearted but not unbelieving sinner. "All infidels are presumptuous prigs," was, perhaps the sermon put into plain English; and, however true that may be, it is not one of those truths which specially warm the Christian heart.

THE EXETER APPOINTMENT.

ALTHOUGH they cannot but be aware that their opposition now is perfectly useless, and serves merely to show the bitterness of their odium theologicum, Dr. Temple's opponents still keep "nagging" at him. As soon as the election was over, two protests against it were deposited, one by the dissentients as a body, and another by Bishop Trower, who is sub-dean of the Cathedral. Both recite the grounds of objection which have been commonly urged; but Dr. Trower goes farther, and declares that he would not have admitted even to ordination as a deacon, the heretical Head Master of Rugby; and if the John Bull may be relied upon, he intends, singly or with others, to oppose the confirmation of the Bishop-elect, in Bow-street Church. But we fancy he will think better of this when the time comes.

One of the hardest bits of censure dealt out against the new bishop, sad to say, comes from an old friend—Mr. Burgon, Vicar of St. Mary the Virgin, Oxford. He has kept silence, he says, as long as he could, but to do so any longer he feels would be a sin. "No earthly regard whatever," he declares, "shall now deter him from speaking out his mind;" and accordingly he pours forth his wrath remorselessly, and gives it his poor friend in doses hot and strong. He regards Dr. Temple's appointment as "a flagrant scandal, and a deplorable calamity," and charges him "with a strange greed for ecclesiastical office." And after some not very charitable invective, he holds it his duty "seriously and publicly to protest against Dr. Temple's being made a bishop," and adds, "and hereby, in the name of God, I do protest. I declare that in the judgment of tens of thousands besides myself his consecration to that sacred office would be a grievous injury and insult to the Church, a heavy blow to the truth, a great discouragement to faith and piety, a stumbling-block in the way of all; it would be even an outrage to common decency and common sense." He affirms that Dr. Temple's contribution to "Essays and Reviews" is all of a piece with the rest of the volume, undistinguishable from the context in which it stands—except, perhaps, by its greater deficiency in logical power and grammatical propriety." Further, he asserts that "it is the work of an unbeliever in Christ's religion"—supposing, of course, he adds, "the writer of it to mean the things which he says." He thus kindly gives his old friend the option of writing himself down either knave or fool—a knave, if he deliberately said what he did not mean—a fool, if he was incapable of saying what he meant to say. But as if he felt he had yielded too much, Mr. Burgon immediately afterwards retracts one part of the alternative which he had given, and makes his friend plainly into a knave, for he associates him in his anathema with "six other dishonest persons." One of the demands very generally made upon the bishop-elect has been a recantation or explanation of his sinful essay; but Mr. Burgon insists "that no withdrawal of this from circulation now can be of any avail; no, nor his expression of regret that it has been productive of terrible mischief;" for, he asks, how can an expression of sorrow for "so heinous a sin constitute fitness for the apostolic office?" The appointment of the Essayist to the charge of a see he compares to the selection of "a condemned criminal to be a judge in civil causes," and he appeals to the bishops to interfere and prevent "this terrible scandal—the perpetration of this gross iniquity."

It may be some consolation, however, to Dr. Temple, that, in answer to a memorial from the Rural Dean and other clergy of the rural deanery of South Maling, the Primate says he does not consider that any blame can fairly attach to Dr. Temple for having contributed to "Essays and Reviews." While he regrets that he did not take the earliest opportunity of dissociating his name from all connection with the volume, he feels bound to give full consideration to the fact that the preface commits each writer only to the opinions expressed in his own essay. And the Archbishop declares that the divine who has been so uncharitably stigmatised as an "unbeliever" is "an earnest and intelligent believer in all the great doctrines set forth in the Prayer-book and Articles."

We may likewise just add, as proofs of the esteem in which Dr. Temple is held by those who know him best, that the assistant masters in the school over which he has so ably presided have commissioned Woolner to execute a bust of him to be placed in the Arnold library; that the boys intend to present him with a testimonial; that a number of old Rugbeians have signified their wish to testify their personal regard for him; that he will receive a congratulatory address from the friendly societies of the neighbourhood at a public dinner; and that his departure from Rugby is the subject of universal regret, both in the school and the town.

ANGEL CHILDREN.

MRS. A. M. WELLS.

ONCE I took a picture fair
To my heart and kept it there,
And I blessed the artist's thought
Who that lovely picture wrought.
Even as I saw it then
Now it comes to me again.

Three small children on their knees,
Under drooping willow-trees!
Pleased and shy they bend to look
In the mirror of the brook.
Not a flower upon the brink
Bending gracefully to drink—
Not a bird that skims the lake,
Softer shadowing could make;
Nor behold reflected there,
Form more innocent and fair.

What, beside those faces three,
In that mirror do they see?
All the blue depths of the sky
In its waters they descry;
And, not theirs alone, but near
Other faces three appear—
Angel faces, dimly seen,
Serious, tender, and serene;
Bending meekly, bearing trace
Of the Heavenly Father's face.
This is why the children look
Pleased, yet thoughtful, in the brook.
Unto little children here
Seraph forms are always near.
Messages of heavenly things
Angel-child to earth-child brings;
So I blessed the hand that wrought
Into form the shadowy thought.

SHARP MEMORIES.

THE following letter appears in Land and Water:
"A friend of mine at Stratford-on-Avon wishing, this past autumn, to procure some honey from his hives, applied the fungus to stupify the bees, as usually done. However, whether from his own awkwardness or the badness of the fungus, he could not thoroughly succeed. The consequence is, he has become an outcast from his garden; the inmates of those two hives will on no account allow him to enter it; his wife and children walk as usual, and stand and watch the hives without any molestation, but immediately he is recognised, however far off, he is pursued and stung by constantly increasing numbers, and made to fly at his best pace; and this occurs months after the event; and he expects the only remedy must be the total destruction of those hives and their vindictive little tenants."

"THE ENGLISH OF IT."

IN the Rev. Hugh Stowell Brown's "Lectures to the Men of Liverpool" we meet with this passage, the only fault that can be found with which is that it is too true:—Dishonest things are often varnished over with words and phrases that cleverly hide their real character. I should like to know what "the English" of "value received" amounts to in some commercial bills. "Speculation" is a very innocent looking word. It may mean no more than the faculty of sight. "Thou hast no speculation in those eyes." It may mean some very harmless exercise of thought upon theology, philosophy, or politics. But in many a case, when the word is used in a mercantile sense, "the English of it" is swindling and robbery. When a man is said to be "in difficulties," "the English of it" often is that he has spent three-halfpence of his own money, and 19s. 10½d. of other people's. Even the word "embezzlement" puts a polish, though slight, I admit, upon fraud; and the word defaulter lets down a wrong-doer rather more gently than the rough and ready word thief. Often, too, when a man has been unfortunate and comes, not begging, but "asking assistance," "the English of it" is that he has played the fool with himself, that he has been an idle, drunken, good-for-nothing fellow. I say often, not always; don't misunderstand me; but if I am to judge from the cases that I have met with, "the English" of "misfortune" is, in nine cases out of ten, "misconduct." And so, for vice in its various forms we, blunt, honest, straightforward Englishmen, who are supposed to "call a spade a spade,"—we, I say, have for vice in its various forms words that don't tell the truth. I suppose we, or our forefathers rather, tried to paint the bloated face of the profligate by calling him a libertine, thus cunningly conveying the idea that he was a person who considered himself free, or a person of liberal ideas; but the paint would not wash, or, rather, it was soon washed off; the beastly features of the animal showed through it, and now the name exposes rather than conceals him; and, so far as the word implies freedom, all know that "the English of it" is freedom from all virtue and from all decency. Instead of calling him a libertine, we now commonly call him a gay man, a man who lives a very gay life; and this word gay is good and pleasant, as we think of it in connection with the mirthfulness and lightheartedness of children, or with the bright plumage and the merry songs of birds; but, as applied to a mode of life, "the English of it" is a thoughtless life, a licentious life, a life spent in ruin of both body and soul, a life in which whatever gaiety there is, is heavily discounted by misery and shame. This word, this great word "life," is itself subjected to the same perversion. To see life is to see folly and wickedness and dirt; for, according to some people, to see life you must see all the slums and stews of the town. Life in fact is a word that often stands for death in its very worst and most horrible form, for the worst and most horrible form of death is a soul dead to wisdom, to truth, to purity, and to God. A career of folly and dissipation is glozed over by the phrase "sowing his wild oats." Many are the attempts to shirk the plain "English" of the words "he is drunk;" no one likes to have this said of him—no one is willing to confess it. And so a man in this condition is excited, or he is not quite himself, or he is disguised, or he is in a state of slight inebriety, or he is mellow, or he has been dining out; and if even a statesman make a fool of himself in an after-dinner speech the apology is that it is an after-dinner speech; and we have got a fine new name for orations of this sort—we call them post-prandial speeches, "the English" of which is "wine-in and wit-out speeches." But to descend from such refined ways of putting it, you may say that your friend has had a drop too much, or he is fresh, or he is tight, or he is screwed; or, strangest of all, he is glorious. It depends a good deal upon who or what he is; if he be a gentleman, he is a little elevated; if he be a working man, he is fuddled; "the English of it" is, in every case, that the fellow is drunk.

THE NEW SCRATCH.

AN American paper says that the buffaloes found in the telegraph poles of the overland line a new source of delight on treeless prairie—the novelty of having something to scratch against. But it was expensive scratching for the telegraph company, and, there indeed, was the rub, for the bison shook down miles of wire daily. A bright idea struck somebody to send to St. Louis and Chicago for all the brad-aws that could be purchased, and these were driven into the poles with the view to wound the animals and check their rubbing propensity. Never was a greater mistake. The buffaloes were delighted. For the first time they came to the scratch sure of a sensation in their thick hides that thrilled them from horn to tail. They would go fifteen miles to find a brad-awl. They fought battles around the poles containing them, and the victor would proudly climb the mountainous heap of rump and lump of the fallen and scratch himself into bliss until the brad-awl broke, or the pole came down. There has been no demand for brad-aws from the Kansas region since the first invoice.

PAPER IN JAPAN.

THE Japanese use paper for a great variety of purposes. A recent traveller states that he saw it made into materials so closely resembling Russian and Morocco leather and pig-skin, that it was very difficult to detect the difference. With the aid of peculiar varnish and skilful painting, paper made excellent trunks, tobacco-bags, cigar cases, saddles, telescope-cases, the frames of microscopes; and he even saw and used excellent waterproof coats, made of simple paper, which did keep out the rain, and were as supple as the best india-rubber. The Japanese use neither silk nor cotton handkerchiefs, towels, nor dusters; paper, in their hands, serves as an excellent substitute. It is soft, thin, tough, of a pale-yellowish colour, very plentiful, and very cheap. The inner walls of many a Japanese apartment are formed of paper, being nothing more than painted screens; their windows are covered with a fine, translucent kind of the same material. It enters largely into the manufacture of nearly everything in a Japanese household; and he saw what seemed to be balls of twine, but which were nothing but long shreds of tough paper rolled up. If a shopkeeper had a parcel to tie up, he would take a strip of paper, roll it quickly between his hands, and use it for the purpose; and it was quite as strong as the ordinary string used at home. In short, without paper, all Japan would come to a dead lock; and, indeed, lest by the arbitrary exercise of his authority, a tyrannical husband should stop his wife's paper, the sage Japanese mothers-in-law invariably stipulate in the marriage settlement, that the bride is to have allowed to her a certain quantity of paper.

THE ROMAN SENTINEL.

THERE was nothing in Pompeii, says Dr. Guthrie, that invested it with a deeper interest to me than the spot where a soldier of old Rome displayed a most heroic fidelity. That fatal day on which Vesuvius, at whose feet the city stood, burst out into an eruption that shook the earth, poured torrents of lava from its riven sides, and discharged, amidst the noise of a hundred thunders, such clouds of ashes that filled the air, produced a darkness deeper than midnight, and struck such terror into all hearts that men thought not only that the end of the world had come and all must die, but that the gods themselves were expiring—on that night a sentinel kept watch by the gate which looked to the mountain. Amid unimaginable confusion and shrieks of terror, mingled with the roar of the volcano, and cries of mothers who had lost their children in the darkness, the inhabitants fled the fatal town, while falling ashes, loading the darkened air, and penetrating every place, rose in the streets till they covered the house-roofs, nor left a vestige of the city, but a vast silent mound, beneath which it lay unknown, dead, and buried, for nearly one thousand seven hundred years.

Amid this fearful disorder the sentinel at the gate had been forgotten; and as Rome required her sentinels, happen what might, to hold their post till relieved by the guard or set at liberty by their officers, he had to choose between death and dishonour. Pattern of fidelity, he stood by his post. Slowly but surely the ashes rise on his manly form; now they reach his breast; and now covering his lips they choke his breathing. He was "faithful unto death." After seventeen centuries they found his skeleton standing erect in a marble niche, clad in its rusty armour—the helmet on his empty skull, and his bony fingers still closed upon his spear. And next almost to the interest I felt in placing myself on the spot where Paul, true to his colours, when all men deserted him, pleaded before the Roman tyrant, was the interest I felt in the niche by the city gate where they found the skeleton of one who, in his fidelity to the cause of Cæsar, sets an example of faithfulness to the cause of Christ—an example it were for the honour of their Master that all his servants followed.

THE LONDON DISTRICT UNITARIAN SOCIETY.

FIFTY-FOURTH SOCIAL MEETING.

THE fifty-fourth social meeting of this society was held on Thursday evening, Nov. 18th, at Radley's Hotel, Blackfriars; S. SHARPE, Esq., in the chair. The attendance was about 100. Among those present were the Revs. H. Ierson, R. Spears, J. C. Means, J. Taylor, M. C. Gascoigne, T. Rix, J. Phillips, J. Marten, T. L. Marshall, R. Shaen (Royston), Dr. Davison and Mr. Richardson (the secretaries of the society), Dr. Dixon, and Messrs. C. Hill, J. T. Preston, S. S. Tayler, C. Moore, R. Bartram, J. Conway, H. H. Stannus, R. Keating, R. Cooper, G. Withal, R. Eve (Aldershot), &c.

The earlier part of the meeting was occupied with some business of a purely official character, relating to the number of the committee and the frequency of their meetings. Some little discussion took place on these matters, but ultimately two resolutions submitted by the committee were passed: 1st, to alter the first rule in order that the number of the committee shall in future consist of twenty, inclusive of treasurer and secretary; and 2nd, that the committee should meet four times a year instead of six—six to form a quorum, instead of nine as heretofore.

A long and interesting paper was then read by Mr. S. S. TAYLER, on "The past history, present position, and future prospects of the London District Unitarian Society." He began by tracing the rise of the society, which originated in a movement among some of the younger members of the London congregations about twenty years ago, who, touched with a profound sense of the value of Unitarian principles, felt that the time was come for a more determined and united effort to make them known. He showed that ever since its establishment in May, 1850, it has in various ways been acting beneficially on the condition of our body in the metropolis—by its quarterly meetings for considering subjects of great interest and importance to our churches; by providing courses of good lectures in eligible districts, in which many of our leading ministers have taken part; by the engagement of the Rev. R. Spears at Stamford-street; and by the operations of the Lay Preachers' Union in forming centres of missionary effort. In a great measure to these various developments and activity he attributed the fact that whereas in 1850 there were fifteen ministers and missionaries steadily working in London, there are now twenty; that against fifteen places where Unitarian Christianity was then preached, there are now twenty-six; and that the average total attendance upon our Unitarian services is nearly doubled. He regarded the retrospect as full of encouragement. The most directly important part of Mr. Tayler's remarks to our readers, however, was his view of the society's PRESENT POSITION.

"I now come to the present position of the society. Twenty years have not sufficed to accomplish the objects of this society as regards the outside public; I find them still lamentably ignorant of our position and principles. I believe that the large majority of the three million inhabitants of the metropolis have never heard the name Unitarian, or, if they have, it has passed them so incidentally as to raise no thought in their minds; and the greater number of those who have heard it suppose it to refer to an all sect of people whose position is rather negative—deniers of Christ! doubters! Rationalists!—who have little religious sympathy, or enthusiasm, or anxiety for the salvation of the world. The posing up of the declaration of Unitarian opinions has conclusively proved this, for a great number have inquired for copies of it, and many have expressed their astonishment at Unitarians quoting Scripture, and others that there existed people in churches holding such opinions. The work of familiarising the public with our tenets and principles is not then fore yet done. The other original object of this society, viz., that 'of promoting a closer bond of union amongst the members of different Unitarian congregations,' can only be said to have been very partially effected; for I find in our last year's report only one hundred and forty-one subscribers, including two ministers, one of whom has died; five of our congregations each furnish about a dozen subscribers, or more than half the number. Our congregations are not represented in proportion to their numerical strength, though our meetings are often attended by those who do not subscribe, but who, at any rate, give their countenance. In a body like ours, which aims to practice as well as preach the right of private judgment, it seems most desirable that opportunities of speaking out in a Christian spirit from the vast number of opinions should be afforded as the most reasonable course for attaining real harmony and union in any direction in which we can work in common. The making arrangement for the holding such meetings as this is therefore one of the present operations of our society; their cost is but trifling.

"There are six chapels or rooms dependent upon your society for a great portion of their rent, averaging about 10s. 6d. per week (about £150 per year); and two others, eight in all, which have to be assisted with supplies for religious services, and lectures, and the contingencies connected with directing public attention to them. The utility of lectures in these places and in other chapels depends a good deal upon the publicity which is given to them by bills, which are an item of considerable expense. But the expense is much less than that of hiring rooms for this especial purpose. The Theological Library, now so useful to the lay preachers, would be improved by additional books. These operations are doing a large amount of good in some parts of the metropolis. We are sometimes told that our efforts have been failures, our operations full of blunders; well, but this only proves the fallibility of its conductors, that they, like ourselves, have been ordinary mortals, and it in no way prevents the aim and objects of this society from being divine; and ultimately crowned by the Divine blessing. If it is true that the collective wisdom of our London body is outside of this society, there is no law that excludes it; and the sooner it comes in and leads us to a wiser course the better.

"The present condition of your society financially will be considered as weak, for a society of this kind is best supported by a large area of small regular subscriptions. The work of making special appeals is a great drag on the energies of your honorary officers, and far from an agreeable task. Now your subscription list is not much over £100 a year, and there is a most alarming deficiency of 5s. subscriptions. I see just twelve. In making this remark I am not going to overlook the fact that many have so nobly responded to appeals, and during the last eight years raised considerable sums, sometimes £300 or £400 in a year.

"The present condition of your society as regards its field of work is most promising, and I cannot doubt that when the great utility and even necessity for this society as a means of diffusing Unitarianism in the metropolis are considered, the well-known generosity of our body will provide larger means. But we cannot be surprised that your officers are not reassured by finding that whilst the district has increased in population three-quarters of a million, the number of subscribers has fallen from two hundred and forty-five to one hundred and forty-one.

"It is well worthy of consideration that any help that you give in founding a society for worship is not in the direction of a pauperising charity, but an encouragement to work, to self help; the people come to give help as much as to receive it. Giving their help as they do on the spot (some £150); it cannot be expected that they should always be able to join as subscribers also. It is therefore necessary to press upon those who have the advantages of comfortable chapels and well ordered services that they are the people who should come forward and subscribe the necessary funds for carrying on this work."

The paper closed with a very hopeful outlook on the future, and an earnest appeal for more active and evangelical work among the people; and at its conclusion was warmly applauded. An animated discussion followed.

The CHAIRMAN said that the society had removed from the Unitarian churches of London the reproach that they were only congregations of the respectable classes, and might boast that it had done the important work of winning great numbers of the humbler classes.

Mr. C. HILL thought that persons of the working classes would appreciate our views of religion presented to them by the studious learned men who had made them the study of their life, rather than by comparatively uneducated men of their own class. He referred to the little permanent good resulting from the labours of Methodist local preachers, and the undesirableness of following their example in lowering the standard of our preaching when the Independents and Baptists and other denominations were making greater efforts than ever before to promote the highest culture of their ministers.

Mr. N. M. TAYLOR, on the other hand, thought that the Methodist local preachers had exercised very great effect upon the working classes, and that the Unitarians might do the same with their simpler and purer religious views. He complained that men of a better and more educated class did not come forward and take part in this work.

Mr. CARTER, of the Walworth Mission, while granting that it would be very desirable that educated laymen should take up the work, said that the fault lay not with those who were doing the best they could, but with those who were able to do better, and yet gave them no aid or countenance.

Mr. MOORE thought there was, in the essence of Unitarianism, an essence of mystification, and contended that they should take their stand upon the simple fatherhood of God and brotherhood of man, without adding the yoke upon the human mind of any other belief. He thought that men could be Unitarians without having anything to do with faith in Christ, and that it was on account of its Christian limitations that the present Unitarianism does not represent the highest intellect and greatest heart of Christendom, and that our religion is based upon the sand and not on the rock. Therefore, he would altogether do away with the idea of Free Christian Churches, Christian Unions, &c.

The CHAIRMAN objected that the speaker was too theological, and reminded him that the society did not interfere with the particular views held by its ministers or members.

The Rev. R. SPEARS vindicated the distinctively Christian character of the society, with the evident general concurrence of the meeting. The society was not a society of Jews, Mahomedans, or mere Theists, but a Christian society. We may write "Ichabod" on our churches if Christ is shut out of them. Those who profess to preach Christianity without Christ are the least successful of all, and in America the greater success of our Churches may partly be attributed to their nearness to Christ. He thought that our want of success arose from our want of zeal and of a full appreciation of the work we have undertaken. He was not disheartened at the smallness of our numbers, but he was disheartened at the want of zeal and liberality on the part of Unitarians, who believed that such important views had been entrusted to their charge.

Mr. SYMONS, one of the lay preachers, said it was not the highest intelligence the working men would follow, but the greatest warm-heartedness—such as led the multitude to Christ. There was much intelligence in our Churches, but little popular sympathy. As a working man he urged them to help the smaller stations, and to send earnest men of his own class to diffuse the simple principles of the religion of Christ.

Mr. BARTRAM said that it was acknowledged by all the preceding speakers that this society seemed to possess little of the confidence of the Unitarian body. He thought that the true cause was that it had a superabundance of zeal but not of discretion. He traced a large portion of the want of success to the time when the Lay Preachers' Union was established. If ours is a great cause, is it not right to send out the best men instead of men totally unfit for the missionary work, who have only driven people away from us instead of attracting them? He deprecated the establishment of a number of unsuccessful little mission stations, and would temper the zeal which had been so much lauded with a considerable amount of discretion.

Mr. WARREN (of Walworth) asked if there was any bar to educated men taking part in the missionary work of the society, and if not, why do they not come forward?

Dr. DIXON vindicated the society from the charge of sending out a number of uneducated men to preach Unitarianism, and pointed out that it had used its funds in assisting in the promotion of Unitarian principles through a great number of places in the metropolis at a very small expense, because the work was almost entirely done by volunteer agency. It was not the fault of the volunteers who came forward for this work, but the fault of the Unitarian public, that sufficient funds were not supplied to place an educated minister in every mission station. The society had done the best it could with the materials and the funds placed at their disposal. In regard to Mr. Moore's speech, he hoped it would be clearly understood that that gentleman expressed his own individual views, and that they do not correspond with those held by Christian Unitarians. He believed that everything that could be done was done in the latter part of the last century to promulgate pure Deistical doctrines, and the result has been not exactly what Mr. Moore predicted would be the case if we preached the opinions he had advocated.

Mr. J. T. PRESTON maintained that long before the establishment of the Lay Preachers' Union this society was never supported by the Unitarian public of London in the way it ought to have been. Many who find fault forget that the society had not the means at its disposal to do the good it wished. In regard to the Lay Preachers' Union, it had been taken up by the District Society as a branch of its operations in the hope that it would have obtained a much larger amount of support from a certain section of our denomination. He thought that the step taken to support one or two of the most promising of the new mission stations a wise one, and it was for the Unitarian public to say how far they will support it. He did not fear for Unitarianism, and never did. It will live and spread, even if we die out. Others will take up the work in other churches, and in the long run our opinions will spread even if by other agencies than ours.

Dr. DAVISON regretted that Unitarians who do not belong to the society had not taken the opportunity of the present meeting to come forward and state plainly what faults it had committed, and why it had lost the confidence of the Unitarian public. Although established as a strictly denominational society, it had met a larger part of opposition from its own denomination. Many Unitarians would rather be Unitarians outside the body than inside. It was very clear that if more support was not given the efforts of the society must be very much contracted, and the committee could not hope to keep up what they are now doing.

The CHAIRMAN reminded the younger members of the society that in 1813 it was criminal to teach Unitarianism, so that all the success we have to talk of must begin from that time. In the year 1844 Unitarians had for the first time fair play, for that was the time when the Dissenters' Chapels Act gave them secure possession of their chapels. We have a large number of persons who call themselves of the "advanced" school who will not own their Unitarianism. But he thought those were most "advanced" who honestly spoke out their opinions. On the whole, however, we had not much reason to be discouraged with our condition.

The meeting was brought to a close by prayer offered by Mr. SPEARS.

INTELLIGENCE.

FLOWERY FIELD.—On Wednesday week a meeting was held in the school-room, to give a cordial welcome to the Rev. J. K. Smith as successor of the Rev. R. C. Denny. The room was nearly full, and there were present Messrs. Thos. Ashton, J. Alcock, J. Thornely, and others. Mr. Alcock presided, and expressed a wish that congregation and minister would work together harmoniously. The Rev. F. Revitt, on behalf of the congregation and ministers of the district, gave Mr. Smith a hearty welcome; and in reply Mr. Smith said he came among them to work, if they would work with him, and to work faithfully, and hoped to be able to show his interest for the welfare of their church, and for their distinctive views. Mr. Thomas Ashton said the question of their chapel would be settled sometime, and the best thing for them to do in order to get it was to show that one was needed. Messrs. J. Broadbent, E. Broadrick, J. Jackson, A. Stafford, and G. Slater also addressed the meeting, which was warm and hearty in its greeting to Mr. Smith.

NEWCASTLE.—A sermon was preached on Sunday morning, the 20th inst., by the Rev. J. C. Street, in the Church of the Divine Unity, on "National Education." Taking as his text the plaintive cry "My children are desolate," he shewed the terrible state of millions of children in England, and the urgent need of our no longer neglecting this peril which would otherwise cripple the Empire. In considering the practical requirements of this matter he upheld the main features of the National Education League scheme.

NOTTINGHAM: CHRIST CHURCH.—The anniversary sermons were preached on Sunday, November 14th, by the Rev. W. Blazey, B.A., of Rotherham. The collections amounted to over £12. On Monday evening, November 15, the annual meeting of teachers and friends was held in the school-room, when about 120 were present. After tea a most satisfactory annual report had been read by Mr. T. W. Lewis. The meeting was addressed by the Revs. Thomas Moss, B.A. (New Church Minister), W. Blazey, B.A., R. A. Armstrong, B.A., C. L. Whitam, and other gentlemen. Most of the speakers spoke earnestly in favour of a national system of education, and of the future work of Sunday-schools.

WHAT THE CHURCHES ARE DOING.

Writing from "Cairo, Nov. 1st," the Daily News correspondent gives an account of the way in which Mahomet's birthday was kept, that in some respects calls to mind the rites of Juggernaut. He says:

"The great public ceremony of the Mussulman year took place to-day. The prostrate bodies of fanatics were ridden over by the Sheikh el Bekree, live snakes were eaten, glass crunched and swallowed, bodies slashed with swords, cheeks and breasts pierced with sharp metal instruments, which were left sticking in the wounds they made, and hundreds of men and boys shrieked and writhed, and wrestled, in what professed to be a mad ecstasy of religious fervour. All this was gone through in the public streets in broad daylight. The chief performers were of the rank of what are called 'street Arabs' at home; though here and there men of a grade higher wound themselves up by shrieks and prayers, and then threw themselves down with the rest."

The Jews, after much negotiation, have obtained permission to erect a synagogue in St. Petersburg, being the first building of the kind that has existed in Russia.

Free-Churchism seems to be everywhere making way. A letter from the Hague states that the Government of the Netherlands "appears to be thinking very seriously of deciding the question of the relations between Church and State in the sense of a separation as complete as possible," and the leading Liberals in France are calling out for the same thing.

Herr Anton, priest of Sarmingstein, in the diocese of Linz (Austria), following Father Hyacinthe's example, has addressed a letter to his bishop in which he states that "it is impossible for him conscientiously to continue to fulfil his spiritual functions at a time when the clergy seem bent on bringing the Church into conflict with the spirit of the age." He has, therefore, resigned his office, with its emoluments, and betaken himself to a secular calling.

Pio Nono must be either very oblivious or very ungrateful. In Cardinal Antonelli's reply to Monsignor Maret's exculpatory letter, he is reported to have assured the archbishop that the Court of Rome was so little acquainted with his book that the Holy Father never dreamt of making it a subject of complaint, still less of persecution. At the same time we read among the subscriptions sent to the Pope for the expenses of the Council, and published in the Catholic organs of France and Rome, numerous entries, of which the following are fair specimens:

"Mlle. Blanche de Raime, who believes implicitly in what the Roman Church teaches, and who protests against Mgr. Maret's book, two francs. "A poor girl who believes more readily in the infallibility of the Pope than in that of Mgr. Maret, one franc.

"Anonymous, who protests against the work of Mgr. the Bishop of Susa in partibus infidelium [biting that!], one franc."

Among the presents brought to the Pope by the Archbishop of New York is a gold fish, with the mouth formed of rubies. This rarity only opens its mouth to throw out pieces of gold, and the coin is both of the best quality and appears to be almost inexhaustible in quantity. Gift fish, it would seem, are not of the nature of gift horses, but are intended to be looked in the mouth. If this shower of gold, however, continues to enrich the Vatican, it will almost induce a doubt in the minds of devout Catholics whether the schoolboy's translation of auri sacra fames as "a sacred thirst for gold," may not be infallibly correct.

The Correspondence has been filling its columns with violent tirades against the Catholic Liberal party; and Monsignor Nardi is addressing letters to the Osservatore Cattolico, in which he bitterly denounces a French Catholic review and the Correspondant of the Prince de Broglie. Such is the boasted harmony of the Roman Church, and the spirit in which it prepares for Council.

The Pope has issued an order enjoining the inhabitants of Rome to prepare themselves for the great event by devotional exercises. Among these are a novena in honour of the Immaculate Conception, which is made obligatory in all churches, and a strict fast on the Vigil of the Conception; and in twenty-two churches there is to be an exposition, (or imposition) of relics and images.

The Westminster Gazette adduces the special invitation which Dr. Newman has received to attend the Council as a theologian, while some well-known continental theologians have been passed over, as a proof how entire is the confidence reposed by the Holy Father in Dr. Newman's orthodoxy.

Since Mgr. Dupanloup, as Bishop of Orleans, became a person of influence in France, the question has often been asked there, but never very satisfactorily answered, "Who is he?" By some he is said to be the son of Charles X.; and those who judge from personal appearance alone might have some show of reason on their side, inasmuch as he bears a remarkable resemblance to the last Bourbon king. Others connect him with Talleyrand. All that is known of the bishop's past life is that, in consequence of certain informalities about his birth, there were some difficulties at Rome about his ordination. Shortly after taking orders he became curé of the parish of St. Roch at Paris, and was always employed by the Court in baptising, preparing for confirmation, &c., the various members of the royal family. He was subsequently transferred to Tours, where he remained as grand-vicaire until his promotion to the see of Orleans in 1857.

The Marquis of Bute, although a Roman Catholic, is not debarred from the exercise of ecclesiastical patronage in Scotland, as he would be in England. Several churches to which he has the right of presentation have become vacant since his lordship attained his majority, and in every case he has left it with the parishioners, greatly to their delight, to choose their own minister.

The Rev. Dr. Wilson, of Bombay, is to be the Moderator of the next General Assembly of the Free Church, and the Rev. George Ritchie, of Jedburgh, is to succeed Dr. Norman Macleod as Moderator of the Supreme Court of the Established Church of Scotland.

The St. Alban's case is to be brought once more before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. The promoters of the suit allege that Mr. Mackenzie has not complied with their Lordships' judgment as to the use of lights, elevation of the elements in the Holy Communion, and prostration during the prayer of consecration. They therefore pray that the monition may be so enforced that "right and justice may be effectually done."

At the last meeting of the Cambridge Union a motion in favour of the abolition of all religious tests at the University was carried by seventy votes against sixty-two. Hitherto the Union has invariably rejected all motions to this effect.

On Monday, too, at the same University, a meeting was held, composed of Heads of Houses, resident Fellows, and others, on the subject of University Tests, at which the unanimous opinion appeared to be that Sir John Coleridge's bill did not go far enough, and a resolution was passed declaring that any measure brought forward with the view of settling the question "should include an enactment that no declaration of religious belief or profession shall be required of any person on obtaining a fellowship, or as a condition of its tenure." And it was agreed that a memorial in the spirit of this resolution should be presented to Mr. Gladstone by a deputation from the University. In moving the first resolution, the Rev. Dr. Thompson, Master of Trinity, said that he heartily hoped that the removal of the tests might attract Dissenters, and that not for their own sakes only, but for the sake of the University. He was confident that the sons of Dissenters of the middle class—and such would chiefly be attracted—would strengthen that element among the students, which all who had the interests of the University at heart most desired to strengthen, the quiet, the temperate, the thoughtful, the industrious. Of such we had now some among us; he wished heartily we could have more.

In consequence of a dispute between the incumbent, the Rev. J. Fisher, and his congregation, nearly the whole of the church-going people of Heapey, near Chorley, to the number of about 500, have "disestablished" themselves, and joined the sect known as the Free Church of England, which consists of two associated bodies, the Countess of Huntingdon's Connexion and another. The cause of the dispute was that the congregation were desirous that Mr. Fisher should appoint the Rev. J. Shaw, LL.D., as his curate; but Mr. Fisher's answer to their representations was, "Mr. Shaw shall never enter that church as long as I have breath." Whereupon, seeing no prospect of concession on his part, they began to build a church of their own, which will be ready for opening at Christmas; and the other evening a meeting was held to determine with what religious body they should connect themselves. While expressing his reluctance to quit the Established Church, Mr. Shaw showed how unlikely it was that they should be able to get their new building consecrated by the bishop of the diocese; and in recommendation of what seemed to him the best course, he said the members of the Free Church were left entirely to manage their own affairs, and would not be tyrannised over either by incumbent, patron, or bishop; they had the selection of their own clergymen, and had everything connected with the church as they wished it to be. Dr. Jackson said if they joined the Free Church they would only be going in advance of the Established Church, as there would be no "Church of England" shortly. A resolution that they should unite themselves with the Free Church was carried unanimously.

The first of the series of meetings for prayer, suggested by Dr. Merle d'Aubigné, during the sitting of the Roman Council, was held on Wednesday, in Freemason's Tavern. After a few remarks from the chairman, the Hon. Arthur Kinnard, M.P., the Hon. and Rev. Baptist Noel read a few passages of Scripture; and then Prebendary Auriol, rector of St. Dunstan's, Fleet-street, prayed that all the machinations of Rome might produce confusion, that truth might be brought out, and many people rescued. After which Dr. Cumming prayed that mercy might be shown to the victims of a great and ancient delusion, that people might be led to contrast the Church in Rome planted by St. Paul with that presided over by its present chief, and that the days of Rome's anticipated triumph might prove that of her predicted ruin; that many might be brought out of darkness into light. This was followed by an address or two, more prayers, and some singing.

The case of the Rev. C. Voysey was heard in the Chancery Court at York on Wednesday. The specific charges against him were:—First, that he had taught that Christ had not made atonement or reconciliation for sin, and had not been made a sacrifice to reconcile his Father to us; and that there was no need for such atonement. Secondly, that mankind were not by nature born in sin and the children of God's wrath, and were not separated from Him by sin, or under His wrath and curse; that they were not in danger of endless suffering; that there was no curse to be removed by the shedding of the blood of Christ, and that the doctrine of man's fall was contrary to the teaching of Christ. Thirdly, that he had taught that our Lord Jesus Christ was no more "very God of very God, begotten, not made," than men were, or doctrine having the same purport and effect; and lastly, that he had maintained, in derogation and degradation of Holy Scriptures, the doctrine that revelation and knowledge of God by means of any book was impossible; that all true knowledge of God came directly from the law of God in men's hearts; that all knowledge of God came only from men's own sense of what He required them to do; and that the only true revelation that was possible by God to man was through the sense of God's presence, and was originated in the heart of man, independently of God's written word.—At the time of our going to press the Chancellor's judgment has not reached us; but we imagine there can be little doubt that he will see sufficient grounds for sending the case to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.

WHAT IS SAYING ON CHURCH MATTERS.

The Roman correspondent of the Pall Mall informs us that a painful impression has been produced at the Vatican by the pastoral letter of Monsignor Dupanloup, to which we referred last week. The decisive language held on the subject of the Pope's infallibility is itself a surprise; but the fact that a Catholic bishop should denounce the bull launched by Paul III. against our own Henry VIII., and deny the power of the Holy See to issue such edicts, has set the theologians mad. The Jesuits can only account for the bishop's temerity by declaring that he has given up all hope of ever obtaining the cardinal's hat. Nevertheless, they are said to be shaken in their design of forcing the Council to adopt the Pope's infallibility as a dogma, and a rumour prevails that the Council will only be asked to give this doctrine the same countenance as the Council of Trent conceded to that of the Immaculate Conception, which was simply to forbid its being made a subject of discussion in Catholic schools. Archbishop Manning and his party, however, are not likely, we imagine, to be satisfied with this.

The Univers, the French Ultramontane organ, is evidently beginning to feel that the opposition which has arisen to the supposed intentions of the Council is of a kind not to be slighted. It accordingly attacks with no little bitterness at once M. de Montalembert and the authors of the address of the laity from Coblenz, and the Abbé Dollinger and Mgr. Maret, and accuses them all of a "plot" against the Church and society. The Abbé Dollinger, it says, is the "chief criminal and instigator of the movement." But the "concert" which exists between all the conspirators "becomes more and more evident;" and the moment chosen for the attack—that, namely, when most of the bishops are absent from their sees—is most "craftily calculated." We can but hope that the fears of the Univers have not unduly magnified the boldness of the "conspirators," and that, like Father Hyacinthe, they will have le courage de ses opinions.

Le Monde, another Ultramontane paper, has made the notable discovery that "Pope Sixtus Quintus, who died in 1590, was the first to conceive the idea of cutting through the Isthmus of Suez." This is another important correction of those profane historians, who are always leading us into some blunder or other. Herodotus tells us that Pharaoh Necho "was the first to undertake a canal, leading into the Red Sea, and which after him Marius carried on; it extends a distance of four days' voyage, and its breadth is such that two galleys may work their oars abreast in it." Somebody must, of course, have imposed on the "father of history," and it is kind of Le Monde to set us all right.

At the annual meeting of the Ecclesiall Conservative Association, in responding to the toast of "Our Constitution in Church and State," a Rev. Dr. Hardinge, after dinner evidently, delivered himself of a speech, the effect of which, in recommending his Church as an ally of the State, few can doubt. These are one or two bits from it:

"The idea of a State separate from the Church was 'earthly, sensual, devilish,' conceived by Satan, brought forth by apostate man, and nursed by idolatry. The man, then, who aimed at separating the State from the Church, however good his intentions, was trying to perpetuate one of the consequences of sin, to preserve one of the works of the devil, to defeat the purposes of God, and to delay the triumphs of the Gospel and the universal felicity of man. The man who pronounced the unity of Church and State to be unlawful gave the lie to the Scriptures, both of the Old and New Testaments, and condemned the constitution of the kingdom of God. They would never desert that good old, tried, and trustworthy vessel, their glorious Constitution in Church and State; and, though she was surrounded with breakers ahead, they would go and take their stand upon her weather-beaten timbers, sound to the last, ready, all ready, and, each of them at his tackle and his gun, would give their adversaries to learn that they would never compromise a single rope in her rigging, nor lower a square inch of her canvas before mortal men."

In his Sword and Trowel, Mr. Spurgeon, who, we are glad to learn, is nearly recovered from his attack of smallpox, thus notices one of the more startling of the recently published works on prophecy—"The last great battle; or, war among the nations until the year 2000."

"We are so sick at soul with the hundreds of pamphlets which are poured forth upon prophetic subjects, that, although we intended to give the titles of this and a score more of such productions which afflict our table, we stop short, and will not help the sale of the rubbish even by mentioning them. That good paper and ink should be wasted in maunders over vials and trumpets is bad enough, but that Christian men should be led to draw vain imaginings as to coming events from the grand Apocalyptic vision, is grievous to the last degree. The imposture of those who foretold the end of the Papacy in 1866 ought to have covered them with shame sufficient to have deterred all aspiring prophetings, but it seems only to have called forth another band of vaticinators who set the date a little later, or, more wisely still, postpone it to the year 2000, by which time they expect to have spent their profits, and to have retired from the scene. Our Lord cometh in such an hour as we think not, and this studying of times and seasons, and setting of dates, is foolery, and worse."

In a third letter to the Record on "Church Reform" the Rev. J. C. Hyle, one of the Evangelical leaders, advises the total suppression of deans and canons, and the application of the cathedral revenues first to the payment of two bishops, chaplains to carry on worship in the cathedrals, and after payment of all expenses of the building and choir to the increase of small church livings. "But there is no time to be lost. If we do not mind what we are about we shall find ourselves in the hands of politicians who will leave us no cathedral establishment to reconstruct, and no Church property to redistribute."

The Record has got into trouble through some assertions it has been making on the spread of Rationalism in the Free Church of Scotland. Our Evangelical contemporary declared that Neological and Rationalistic views have spread to such an extent among the clergy of the Free Kirk, as seriously to darken the prospect of its future. This the Weekly Review emphatically denied, and called on the Record to prove its assertions by naming any instances of the kind which it referred to. We hardly think the Record could fairly be expected to do this; and it seems not unlikely that its opinion has been founded on the fact, though there are some others which support it, that the North British Review, which was established to be the organ of the Free Church of Scotland, and has been so for about twenty years, has recently changed hands, and become the property of a more liberal party in theology. The Weekly Review however, repels the accusations of the Record with no little warmth, and admonishes it to guard in future against being a false accuser, and even goes so far as to impute wilful dishonesty to our saintly contemporary—which is rather hard.

In replying to the charges brought against him at York, the Rev. C. Voysey spoke thus strongly in reference to one of them:

"The theory which he was charged with denying, namely, that mankind were born in sin and the children of God's wrath, and that they (unbaptised infants, for instance) were under the curse, and in danger, apart from actual sin, of endless suffering, was one of the theories and glosses which had been put upon the Articles. If the Court considered that this and this only was the doctrine of the Church of England; if the Church really taught what he denied, to wit, that when Eve ate the apple God the Father cursed the whole human race, and determined that they should all be perpetually tortured in hell fire after death, and that before, or at the time, or subsequently, he made a covenant (in the proper sense of the word, which implied distinct contracting parties) with God the Son, by which, if God the Son would be crucified (which the contracting parties considered equivalent to being accursed), the Father would relieve all or some of the human race from the curse upon some condition of their believing something or other of which most of them never heard,—if this was really the doctrine of the Church, let it be stated distinctly, and let him (Mr. Voysey) be turned out if he denied it. He should only be too glad to go. No power on earth should induce him to teach such an odious mixture of falsehood and absurdity. If he had understood that the thirty-nine Articles meant what the court was asked to say they did mean, if he had not been led by the caution of their language, and by the ambiguous half meanings which clergymen usually attached to those doctrines, to suppose that he was not pledged to the revolting theory which he had stated in order to denounce, he would rather put his hand into the fire than have signed his name to such infamous blasphemy."

MAX MULLER ON NIRVANA.*

BUDDHISM is one of the most widely-spread religions on the earth. The teachings of Siddharta are the spiritual food of one-third of the human race, who reverence the Great Master, for his humility, his benevolence, and his wide-extending mercy. This large acceptance alone must give Buddhism an importance in the eyes of those who study mythology, or that new science or hope of one—the Science of Religion. But when we find also that Buddha was a teacher of peace, and that of all his myriad disciples none owe their convictions to the overhanging sword; when we find too that however far from being practised in all their integrity, the Buddhist code of morals is one of singular purity, and nearly allied to the morals of Christianity, which it preceded by some six centuries, we cannot but rejoice at the signs that now present themselves on every hand of the deep attention which is being given by English students to the life and teachings of Buddha Gautama. Of the morality of the Buddhists one single example may suffice. The first commandment of the Buddhists is, Thou shalt not kill. Living in a land where blood flowed like water, and where a man's life was as little esteemed as a dog's, Siddharta did not content himself with saying, Thou shalt not murder. His soul raised itself to a higher aim, and with the stars of heaven above his head and the stars of earth beneath his feet, his love embraced all the creatures to whom the Great God had given the gift of life, and he said, Thou shalt not kill. No disciple of Buddha may take away from the least of animate beings that breath of life which he cannot give.

Of all the Buddhist doctrines, that of Nirvana is the one which has caused most dispute. The word which signifies extinguished, is the name given by the Buddhists to the final condition of the human soul. On the one hand it is argued that the word must be taken ou pied de la lettre, to mean total, utter extinction and annihilation. On the other, it is urged that the name is not confined to Buddhism, but is used also by the Brahmins for the condition in which the soul loses its separate existence by entering into, and being absorbed by, the godhead. The words of the Buddhist teachers, we think, point to some ideal state not unlike the Christian's heaven, a place of rest where the wicked cease from troubling and the weary are at rest. Upon this interesting and important question we have now to notice the latest contribution of Professor Max Müller, whose previous labours in the same wide field of labour have given him a world-wide reputation. Professor Müller argues from the clear, honest character of the Buddha against that theory of annihilation taught by the Buddhist divines in his name. He shows that this is not the popular belief in Nirvana, and quoting some sayings from the Buddhist canon opposed to the idea of the total destruction of the soul, he observes, "If these sayings have maintained themselves, in spite of their contradiction to orthodox metaphysics, the only explanation in my opinion is that they were too firmly fixed in the tradition which went back to Buddha and his disciples." "The living are few but the dead are many." Shall we not rather think, then, that the Master offered to the faithful servant, who had grown faint with the contest against the world and the flesh, that repose which is the contrast to the turmoil of the present life. Would he not lead the weary one through the green fields and by the pleasant streams, and let him see the glories of the asphodel valleys beyond the dark river of death? And such is the popular idea of the Nirvana; such, we think, would be what Siddharta himself taught about it. Mr. Müller concludes his lecture by an extract from the volume now in the press—"The Parables of Buddhaghosa's Parables, translated from the Burmese by Captain Rogers, with an introduction containing Buddha's Hammapadam, or the Path of Virtue." This work when it appears will be of high interest to the student of Buddhism, containing as it does specimens of those teachings, in parable and metaphor, which would come home to the breast and business of the great mass of the people, who see in a religious teacher not a metaphysician, but a moralist. They care little for the abstractions of the theologians, but absorb eagerly lessons of mercy, and justice, and love. At a future opportunity we may return to the subject.

AMERICAN NOTES.

An article, headed "Mr. Beecher's Private Habits," in a recent number of the Philadelphia Sunday Dispatch, makes some amusing if not authentic contributions to the "great preacher's" biography. After telling us at what hour Mr. Beecher goes to bed, and that he never dines with his hat on, the writer enlarges upon his peculiarities as a farmer. Mr. Beecher cultivates thirty-six acres on scientific principles. He does nothing without consulting books. "Upon one occasion, when it seemed morally certain that the hay ought to be cut, the hay-book could not be found, and before it was found the hay was all spoiled." But, apart from accidents, Mr. Beecher is successful with hay, and "raises some of the finest crops of wheat in the country." His strawberries would rival either crop "if the robins would eat turnips, but they won't, and hence failure." Mr. Beecher makes mistakes sometimes. Two years ago he sowed twenty-seven acres of water melons, which came up pumpkins. A grand idea of "concentration" that occurred to him was even a greater failure. Having discovered one egg in every hen's nest, he gathered them all under an experienced old fowl, "which roosted over that contract night and day for eleven weeks," anxiously supervised by Mr. Beecher himself, but nothing came of it. The eggs were "infamous porcelain things." Finally, we learn that, though Mr. Beecher's farm does not pay now, it is expected to do so when the outlay for books ceases. Under the head of moral habits the writer assures us that Mr. Beecher never swears; but, if he did, "he would throw into it an amount of pathos, and splendid imagery, and moving earnestness, and resistless energy, topped off and climaxed with a gorgeous pyrotechnic conflagration of flagree and fancy swearing that would astonish and delight the hearer, and for ever after quiver through his bewildered memory an exquisite confusion of rainbows, and music, and thunder and lightning. A man of high order of intellect could sit and listen to Mr. Beecher swear for a week without getting tired."

The Rev. Thomas Timmins, one of our Home Missionary Students, and for a time minister at Bridgwater, having been invited to supply the pulpits of the Unitarian societies of Brighton and of Chelmsford for six months, has accepted the invitation of the former.

A new mission society has been started at Chicago with good prospects of success, under the charge of Mr. Wendte. At the opening service, the Rev. Laird Collier, the leader of the movement, said the prime object of it was to gather in those who had no religious home, and were flitting from church to church, not fully satisfied with any, and to give them a welcome to a generous faith. He wanted, too, to bring the half-hearted Unitarians out of the orthodox Churches into the Unitarian fold, and let them find what they want and crave in a genial, loving, liberal faith. He did not want, or expect, to draw any from the other liberal Churches; there was enough material to found a new society without that. The Rev. C. A. Staples followed in some earnest words, describing the purpose of liberal Christianity. He thought it was a union of the heart, and not an effort to reconcile the irreconcilable, to mould men to the same intellectual pattern. The unity was a unity of purpose, of love, and not of exact theological dogmas. The Rev. Robert Collyer supplemented his brother Collier's list of those to be gathered into the new enterprise by adding sinners. He trusted that Mr. Wendte's ministry would be entirely successful in this respect, in drawing in those who needed saving, those who had always been outside the pale of any Church or any direct Christianising influence. He believed that the society would and could be built up without draining a single member from either of the three churches. He gave earnest encouragement to the new society and its minister, and prayed for the blessing of God upon them both.

At an ecclesiastical court held at Westboro, composed of delegates from neighbouring orthodox churches, and called to try the case of the Rev. Mr. Dean, some curious facts were brought to light. The opponents of Mr. Dean objected to him because he preached too harshly the doctrine of eternal punishment, and had refused to take part with the Unitarian minister at a funeral. It would seem from the trial that a portion of the orthodox church were liberal, and desired to recognise the Unitarians as Christians, but the minister could have no fellowship with such heretics. He informed one of his members that for thirteen years the orthodox church had been "hugging Unitarianism like a kitten." "Unitarians," he said, "persistently trampled on the blood of Christ and scouted the Atonement; yet a portion of the church indicated a tendency to slide into Unitarianism." Some of them had even gone so far as to say, "There are as good Christians in Unitarians as in other Christian churches." But he, as preacher of a sound orthodox gospel, would have no fellowship with Unitarians. "They had no God if they denied His son. Their creed was a damnable heresy, and one that brought damnation in its train. He did not wish to partake of the evil deeds of Unitarian ministers, and he had not done it; his hands were clean." Notwithstanding this faithfulness to the orthodox doctrine, and the fact that he had received large accessions to the church and had a flourishing Sunday-school, the council advised his dismission.

The Unitarian Association have decided to take the Christian Examiner and unite the Monthly Journal with it, making a new magazine, of which, we are glad to learn, the Rev. E. E. Hale has consented to become the editor.

THE TWELVE DAYS' MISSION.

SATAN ought to be in a poor way just now. The Ritualists have been having what some of them call a "combined assault" upon him, almost literally after the approved ancient method, with "bell, book, and candle;" while the Evangelicals are on the point of executing a sort of flank movement on his reputed ally by praying for the Pope—might we not say at him?—all through the meeting of the Ecumenical Council. But what will be the practical result? To read the description of the style of oratory that has been largely in vogue during these twelve days, one's hope that SATAN may indeed be demolished is distracted by the wicked thought that, if so, his fate must have been akin to that which SYDNEY SMITH invoked on some obnoxious bishop, of being "preached to death by wild curates," even if we are not septical enough to think that after all he may take it as easily as the navy took his little wife's beating, with the consoling reflection that "it pleased her and did not hurt him."

So much for the ludicrous side of the movement, for it has had its ludicrous side. There has been a great deal of display and bombast about it—a good deal of rant and clap-trap and exaggeration. And we have the less hesitation in attacking this side of it because there is another side deserving of far different treatment. However true the account in the Pall Mall Gazette—written, be it remembered, by one who went, as he confesses, to listen merely to a display of eloquence,—that was but one out of many hundred services; and the general reports in others besides church papers bear a testimony too uniform to be rejected, that the movement has been on the whole a bold, earnest attempt, manfully and ably carried out, to arrest the attention of society from richest to poorest, and to interest the sinful and indifferent in religion. For a fortnight about 120 churches in the metropolis have been open, with short services held from time to time during the day, in some cases almost continuously from seven in the morning to nine at night; and sermons have been delivered—short, homely, and with an utter breaking away from the ordinary pulpit style; and these churches have mostly been continuously well attended, and many of them have been crowded by congregations among whom has been exhibited the most absorbing interest, and very commonly tokens of strong impression and emotion.

It is difficult, of course, to judge what the permanent effects may be, but if it be true that thousands have been attracted who ordinarily never enter a place of worship, we cannot but regard it as a good work. Many will decry it as mere excitement. Be it so—is it not, at any rate, a better excitement than that amid which such people are commonly living? After all, religion is the most tremendous reality that man has to do with, and if at the bottom of the excitement there has been any honest speech right home to men's souls about God, and righteousness, and eternity, it cannot but have done good.

The most significant thing, however, in the whole movement has been the complete bursting loose by the Ritualists, under the impulse of what we believe to be in the main a genuine enthusiasm, from all the pretence of conformity to the old church standards, which they have heretofore studiously maintained. For the time, Courts of Arches, Privy Council decisions, understandings and compromises, have been forgotten, and the Ritualists have gone to lengths before unknown. Incense has been freely used, Mariolatry has been preached up as plainly as infidelity has been preached down, confession and penance have been enjoined and practised as a systematic part of the movement, the liturgy has been treated with about as little regard as if it were a private compilation of prayers, and while some clergymen have preached without even the enjoined gown or surplice, others have run riot in the tawdry millinery of counterfeit Romanism. Now, we do not for a moment desire to press this as in any way dishonest or discreditable. We believe it to be the most honest thing that the Ritualists have ever done. It seems to us as if they had at last become disgusted with their trifling and playing with their principles, and had been stirred with a vehement impulse to stand forth with them, as strong, genuine men, face to face with the awful problem of the world's apathy and sin. And we believe they have done this—done it as the Evangelicals have never succeeded in doing it, and as the Broad Church party have hardly even dreamed of trying to do it. And what is most remarkable, perhaps, is the boldness alike of their conception and of its execution. They have attempted a great popular movement in the churches—and, what certainly we hardly looked for in the High Churchmen, mainly by preaching. While the Evangelicals in the Church, the great upholders of the pew system which keeps the common people out of the churches, have, in despair, been resorting to all kinds of irregular services in theatres and neutral places; and while a supercilious Broad Churchism, viewing the religious defects of the time through its eye-glass, has kept suggesting as its great panacea that sermons should be done away, or the congregation allowed to leave before they begin; these High Churchmen have boldly chosen their position in the churches themselves, and, merely letting it be known that men could come into them as freely as into a public park, have said, "Here we will take our stand, and we will speak to men so that even in the busy week days in England's busiest city we will make them hear."

And they have made them hear; and we are much mistaken if they do not suggest to others thoughts of some of the conditions needful to men generally being made to hear—thoughts of how our churches might be made at once more open and more attractive places, and our worship go with more of the ring of hearty reality in it, and our preaching be more that of men who have a message to deliver—a message which we feel will be a very Gospel to those who will receive it, a message which we will make men hear.

RECENT HONOURS TO UNITARIAN PUBLIC MEN.

SEVERAL noteworthy illustrations have lately been supplied of the active and prominent part which, as a rule, Unitarians take in public matters. We suppose it is indisputable that, in proportion to its numbers, our body supplies more representatives to Parliament than any other; whilst in hardly a less degree the civic chairs of our corporations, magisterial benches, and boards of guardians, find them occupying positions of usefulness and honour.

Within a very few months several of our friends have been complimented with special distinctions. Mr. JAMES CLARKE LAWRENCE, long a generous supporter of Unitarian interests, has retired from the ancient and dignified office of Lord Mayor of London with a Baronetcy. Mr. T. G. FROST, of Chester, after discharging with great ability and success the duties of the mayoralty of that city, was made a Knight, on the occasion of the visit of the Prince of Wales. Mr. Alderman PINNOCK has just been elected Mayor of Newport (Isle of Wight), for the second time. His appointment was a unanimous one; and at a banquet, given in honour of the occasion, on the evening of the 9th ult., many interesting references were made to the fact, that he was "the first Dissenter and Liberal who had been chief magistrate of that town. His uniformly consistent, firm, and courteous conduct, and the independence with which he had ever maintained his opinions, unpopular as they are, were amply acknowledged, and by none more handsomely and kindly than by the liberal-minded vicar of Newport. The Unitarians of Somersetshire have often been indebted for liberal aid and personal zeal to Mr. W. F. CUFF, of Moorlands, near Crewkerne. He recently retired from the chair of the Chard Union, a post which he had filled with great acceptance for upwards of fifteen years. His former colleagues resolved to ask his acceptance of a handsome silver salver and tea service, and the presentation was attended with many circumstances calculated to enhance the value of the compliment. Mr. Cuff "gratefully accepted the present at the hands of the Chairman of the Board of Guardians, happy to hear that they approved of his services on behalf of the poor, and happy also that his children were present to witness the honour done to him." This compliment to Mr. Cuff is all the more marked from the fact (if we are rightly informed) that he has had to overcome a good deal of odium in past times arising from his practice of giving his farm-labourers not only fair but good wages—himself setting the unpopular example—instead of first under-paying them, and then keeping them partly out of the poor's rates—a practice but too common in many agricultural districts.

THE BISHOP OF EXETER.

THE question brulante (as the French would call it) of Dr. Temple's appointment has now ended, as we always said it would; and there can be no doubt that he will be duly consecrated, and in a few weeks be enthroned, and quietly installed in his see. He has shown how confident he himself feels of this by having appointed his secretary, Mr. Burch, who filled the same office for his predecessor, and having given notice that he intends to hold an ordination on the Feast of the Epiphany. There will still be some wild talk on the matter, and the John Bull makes known that Bishop Trower and two of the clergy of the Exeter diocese have retained the services of a proctor to oppose the confirmation of Dr. Temple's election, and the committee appointed to resist his episcopation are calling upon all who desire the purity of the faith to supply them with funds (the Hampden appeal cost £1,500) for carrying on the war against him; but to no purpose, except to display their spite and impotence.

In the meantime, one of the leading High Churchmen of Exeter, the Rev. John Ingle, has not only declined to sign a memorial against Dr.

Temple's consecration, but in a caustic letter he gives him a severe but well-merited rebuke. He says:

"You speak of Dr. Temple's continued countenance of the 'Essays and Reviews,' forgetful of the fact that such countenance is certainly a matter purely of your own inference and surmise, and may for all you know exist only in your own imagination. Your only ground for the charge is that he did not adopt that particular mode of purgation which you (and I too) think he should have adopted. Your other unfounded assumption is an uncharitable one. You speak and write and act as if no one but those who join your protests and memorials can care for the purity and integrity of the catholic faith. On this head I wish only to say, that I would point simply to my own past life and to that of your lordship. There is about the memorial before me only one thing on which I can look with satisfaction: it is the absence of those fearful accusations which made my blood run cold as I read your lordship's letter to the Lord Primus of the Church of Scotland. How can you or anybody else know that even 'Essays and Reviews' have ruined souls? Does your lordship still dare thus to sit on the Throne of the Eternal Judge? I trust that the absence from the memorial of this fearful element of the letter may be taken as proof that your lordship's eyes have been opened to its terribly profane character."

Mr. Burdon, too, Dr. Temple's old friend, who was forced, as we mentioned last week, to relieve his mind by venting a number of uncharitable things against him, receives a still severer castigation at the hands of the Rev. J. A. Doyle, of All Souls' College, Oxford. In a letter to the Guardian he says:

"Mr. Burdon charges Dr. Temple with holding and teaching heresy. The grounds of this accusation are twofold. Mr. Burdon tells us that he has read Dr. Temple's essay, and is prepared to assert, in all the dignity of italics, that it is 'the work of an unbeliever in Christ's religion.' Who is Mr. Burdon, that he should claim to lay down the canon of orthodoxy and heresy with quasi-Papal infallibility? But Mr. Burdon does not depend solely on his own authority. He calls confirmatory evidence; and whose? That of the Westminster Review? A clergyman of the Church of England is accused of heresy, on the authority of a magazine notoriously hostile to Christianity. How long has Mr. Burdon regarded the Westminster Review as a final court of appeal upon Anglican doctrine? Mr. Burdon knows well enough that no one would repudiate more earnestly than Dr. Temple that unholy alliance with infidelity which the Westminster Review tried to force on the latitudinarian party in the Church of England. What is the charge which the Westminster Review brought against Dr. Temple, and which Mr. Burdon has not scrupled to repeat? Dr. Temple is accused of complicity in a work which denies many of the doctrines taught by the Church of England, and throws doubt on many of the fundamental doctrines of Christianity. Were this true, every liturgy and creed which Dr. Temple had repeated, every form of Christian worship in which he had joined, would have been an act of hypocrisy. I use no strained or rhetorical language when I say that I cannot imagine a more appalling charge brought against a clergyman of the Church of England. Yet this is the charge brought against Dr. Temple by these new allies, Mr. Burdon and the Westminster Review. That a partisan magazine, writing for party purpose, should have brought forward such an accusation, is sad enough; what shall we say when a priest of the Church of England is found to repeat that accusation? Dr. Temple has, according to Mr. Burdon, shown himself unfit to rule over a diocese. Mr. Burdon has shown himself unfit to dogmatise on any question which is to be treated, I will not say on principles of Christianity, but on principles of justice and truth."

In answer to a kind letter from the Bishop of Lincoln, urging him to repudiate all responsibility for the opinions expressed by the other writers of "Essays and Reviews," Dr. Temple replies:

"All consideration only brings me back to this, that the one safe rule for me to follow is the law of the Church of England. While I am neither refusing to say or do what the law does not require I am on safe ground; and the responsibility lies with the law, and not with me. The moment I step beyond these limits, I take the responsibility on myself, and I cannot shift it; and whatever ill consequences may follow, the blame is mine. It is true, my lord, that what you propose is studiously, generously moderate. But to concede it is to concede the whole principle. And, while I am quite sure that very few indeed would be satisfied with what you propose, who are not in their hearts tolerably well satisfied already; I am sure, too, that were I to agree, I should only lay myself open to fresh demands to which I could no longer return the one sufficient answer, that I was keeping strictly within the limits of the law of the Church of England."

Almost the only point of interest connected with the subject which remains for us as Nonconformists now is, how far the High Churchmen, who look up to Dr. Pusey as their leader, will follow him should he be prepared to act on his talk of seeking disestablishment. We opine but a very little way. Nous verrons.

THE LIBERATION SOCIETY: NEW PUBLICATIONS.

It would be seen from an address in our columns last week, that the Executive Committee of the Liberation Society are preparing for the issue of several new series of publications, adapted to various classes of the community, and that, besides securing the services of competent writers by direct application, they intend throwing a portion of the work open, by offering prizes for the production of particular works, especially a volume for the young, to be historical and biographical in character, and some good popular tracts. We wish to call attention to these announcements, as it is important that all the available talent at the society's command should be enlisted in its cause. Of the work for the young we will say only, that we believe the committee's proposal will prove to be especially useful, as there is great need of some counteractant to the churchy twaddle which some popular writers mix up with their otherwise good stories for the young; and certainly the annals of Nonconformity, if fairly used, afford a noble store of materials calculated to make young people proud of their Dissent.

FIRESIDE READINGS.

OUR ANGEL-BABY.

We mourn for a spirit gone,
Gone from us far away;
An angel that came in a baby form,
To bless us in peace and soothe us in storm,
From the realms of light and day.
Fresh from our Father's arms,
To dwell with us she came,
And His blessing lay on her shining head—
But ere two happy years had fled,
To His arms she returned again.
And her mother weeps full sore,
And sad grows her father's face,
When they think that their darling shall never more,
With willing feet o'er the nursery floor,
Run smiling to their embrace.
Her eyes were of purest blue,
Her cheeks so soft and fair,
And her sunny locks o'er her snow-white brow
Hung—Ah, I think I can see them now—
With a grace and beauty rare.
Often when tired with play,
As she sat on her mother's knee,
We marvelled to note the deep, deep thought
That lay in her eyes—We knew not she sought
Things that we could not see.
She was her father's joy,
And at the close of day,
When with fevered brow and throbbing brain
He lay on his couch, she soothed the pain,
And kissed his cares away.
E'en now while thus I write,
I seem to hear the tread
Of tiny feet that run tripping by,
And I see the glance of a beaming eye,
And the gleam of a golden head.
But, baby, thou art gone—
Gone from us far away!
Were our hearts too cold for thine so warm,
Was our life so fraught with care and storm,
That with us thou couldst not stay?
Yet why should we sorrow thus?
Our darling is not lost;
She is but gone to the home above,
The home of eternal peace and love,
From this world so storm be-tossed.
And ever her memory dear
Shall be like a guiding star,
To lead us onward o'er life's rough road,
Onward, and onward to God's abode,
Where nought our joy shall mar.

WONDERS OF THE DEEP.

At the last meeting of the Royal Society, our friend Dr. William Carpenter communicated some remarkable results of deep-sea dredgings off the north of Scotland, the Faroe islands, and the Irish coasts, made in a ship placed by Government at the disposal of the men of science. With the help of an ingenious captain, who took a deep interest in their researches, they were enabled to explore the bed of the sea at a depth of 2,500 fathoms, that is to say, nearly as far down as Mont Blanc is high, with a dredge which weighed eight hundredweight, and brought up more than a hundredweight of sea flooring at once. It had hitherto been supposed that at these great depths, where the temperature of the water is always below freezing point, where it is full of carbonic acid, and where the quantity of light is exceedingly small, there was and could be no animal life whatever. These dredgings, however, have proved that there is abundance of life at the bottom of the deepest ocean abysses. A large number of molluscs hitherto unknown to science were brought up in the dredge along with innumerable animalcule, of whose bodies and shells the chalk formations are largely composed. At one haul they fished up, at a moderate estimate, 20,000 specimens of a single form of echinus (sea-urchin). And along with these infinitesimally minute creatures were others of much higher organisation with perfect eyes, proving that fishes can see down in the very depths. Sir Charles Lyell suggests that much phosphorus is probably used for night lamps down there. After a storm the quantity of carbonic acid in the sea is found to be greatly diminished, so that the gales which wreck the poor sailors contribute largely to the health and enjoyment of the fishes.

A LITTLE HERO.

In spite of Mr. Carlyle and some who follow in his wake, we firmly believe, and should be sorry not to believe, that there is now as much true heroism in the world as ever there was, though it may be, somewhat different in kind, and manifest itself in a quieter and less striking way. We have a touching instance of it, given in an American paper, on the part of a noble little fellow, only six years of age. He and his two sisters, five and three years old respectively, children of Mrs. Lewis, of New Orleans, wandered into a swamp and lost their way. When night came on, the little fellow stripped himself of his own clothing and wrapped it around his sisters, and they all lay down on the ground to spend the night. When found in the morning all were insensible, and the youngest has since died.

THE ARAB.

In the last number of the Atlantic, the Rev. James Freeman Clarke, in an interesting notice of "Mohammed," gives an account of the race to which the prophet belonged. He says that the Arabs are a Semitic people, belonging to the same great ethnologic family with the Babylonians, Assyrians, Phœnicians, Hebrews, Ethiopians, and Carthaginians. It is a race which has given to civilised man his literature and his religion; for the alphabet came from Phœnicians, and the Bible from the Jews. In Hannibal, it produced perhaps the greatest military genius the world has seen; and the Lyrian merchants, circumnavigating Africa, discovering Great Britain, and trading with India, ten centuries before Christ, had no equals on the ocean until the time of the Portuguese discoveries, twenty-five centuries after. The Arabs alone, of the seven Semitic families, remained undistinguished and unknown till the days of Mohammed. Their claim of being descended from Abraham is confirmed by the unerring evidence of language. The Arabic roots are, nine-tenths of them, identical with the Hebrew; and a similarity of grammatical forms shows a plain glossological relation. But while the Jews have a history from the days of Abraham, the Arabs had none till Mohammed. During twenty centuries these nomads wandered to and fro, engaged in mutual wars, verifying the prediction (Gen. xvi., 12) concerning Ishmael: "He will be a wild man; his hand will be against every man, and every man's hand against him." Wherever such wandering races exist, whether in Arabia, Turkistan, or Equatorial Africa, "darkness covers the earth, and gross darkness the people." The earth has no geography, and the people no history. During all this long period, from the time of Abraham to that of Mohammed, the Arabs were not a nation, but only a multitude of tribes, either stationary or wandering. But of these two the nomad or Bedouin is the true type of the race as it exists in Northern Arabia. The Arab of the South is in many respects different—in language, in manners, and in character—confirming the old opinion of a double origin. But the Northern Arab in his tent has remained unchanged since the days of the Bible. Proud of his pure blood, of his freedom, of his tribe, and of his ancient customs, he desires no change. He is in Asia what the North American Indian is upon the Western Continent. As the Indian's, his chief virtues are courage in war, cunning, wild justice, hospitality and fortitude. He is, however, of a better race—more reflective, more religious, and with a thirst for knowledge. The pure air and the simple food of the Arabian plains keep him in perfect health, and the necessity of constant watchfulness against his foes, from whom he has no defence of rock, forest, or fortification, quickens his perceptive faculties. But the Arab has also a sense of spiritual things, which appears to have a root in his organisation. The Arabs say, "The children of Shem are prophets; the children of Japhet are kings; and the children of Ham are slaves." Having no temples, no priesthood, no religious forms, their religion is less formal and more instinctive, like that of children. The Koran says, "Every child is born into the religion of nature; its parents make it a Jew, a Christian, or a Magian." But when Mohammed came, the religion of the Arabs was a jumble of Monotheism and Polytheism—Judaism, Christianity, Idolatry, and Fetishism. At one time there had been a powerful and intolerant Jewish kingdom in one region. In Yemen, at another period, the King of Abyssinia had established Christianity. But neither Judaism nor Christianity had ever been able to conquer the peninsula; and at the end of the sixth century, idolatry was the most prevailing form of worship.

WEDDED LOVE.

JOHN G. WHITTIER.

WHAT if the husband or the wife
In home's strong light discovers
Such light defects as failed to meet
The blinded eyes of lovers?
Why need we care to ask? Who dreams
Without their thorns of roses,
Or wonders that the truest steel
The readiest spark discloses?
For still in mutual sufferance lies
The secret of true living,
Love scarce is love, that never knows
The sweetness of forgiving.

SCOTTISH UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

THE annual meetings of this association were held in Glasgow on Sunday and Monday, 21st and 22nd November. Special services were held in St. Vincent-street Church, where, on Sunday morning, the Rev. HENRY W. CROSSKEY preached an eloquent sermon on "Liberal Christianity;" in the evening the Rev. J. PAGE HOPPS, the minister of the church, spoke of "the Church of the future as foreshadowed by the Unitarian Church of to-day."

The ninth annual business meeting was held on Monday, 22nd ult., in the Directors' Room of the Merchants' House—A. BETHUNE, Esq., of Leibo, Fifeshire, presiding. There were deputations from Dundee, Paisley, Aberdeen, Edinburgh, and Liverpool.

The Rev. H. W. CROSSKEY read the report for the year 1869:

The association was formed for the purpose of connecting together their isolated churches in Scotland, and enabling the strong to help the weak, and of promoting a wider diffusion of their cherished principles. The British and Foreign Unitarian Association had generously aided their aid, in the first instance £100 a year, and subsequently an additional £100, having been voted for missionary work in Scotland. There was little personal fellowship among the scattered churches of their body, and each was struggling for itself and by itself in comparative loneliness; but through the instrumentality of the association relationships had been established between individuals and churches, which had increased alike the geniality and power of their labours on behalf of their common faith. Without the association the church at Aberdeen could not have sustained a regular ministry, there could not have been any church established at Dundee, and no assistance would have been given to their Paisley brethren.

Mr. Crosskey then read reports from these places as to the progress which Unitarianism was making there, and then proceeded with his general report, which stated that the lectures, which had diffused religious knowledge in large centres of population by their missionaries, had entirely depended upon the association for their opportunities of delivery. The treasurer stated that they had a balance in hand of upwards of £70. The Rev. J. F. SMITH, Edinburgh, moved that the report be received, adopted, and printed. He observed that there was everything to encourage the members of the Unitarian body to still more strenuous and unwearied effort. Mr. A. L. KNOX, Glasgow, seconded the motion, which was adopted. Mr. George HOPE, Fenton Barns, moved that the warmest thanks of the association be presented to the Rev. Mr. Crosskey for many services in the past as one of the secretaries of the association. Mr. Adamson, Glasgow, seconded the motion, which was also adopted. Mr. Crosskey, in returning thanks, said that the prosperity of the association would always give him the greatest satisfaction. The office-bearers for the ensuing year were then appointed; Mr. W. Mackie, of Auchincraig, being re-elected president, and the Revs. J. Page Hopps and R. B. Drummond joint secretaries. This concluded the business meeting.

There was then held, in the hall above, the soirée of the association. A. BETHUNE, Esq., presided; and on the platform were the Revs. H. W. Crosskey (Birmingham), Alex. Gordon (Liverpool), J. Page Hopps (Glasgow), H. Williamson (Dundee), J. G. Slater (Aberdeen), J. F. Smith (Edinburgh), T. W. Scott (Paisley), and Messrs. R. B. Blyth and J. Warren (Edinburgh), H. C. Briggs (Dundee), George Hope (Fenton Barns), and others. After tea, the Chairman delivered a short address, in which he observed that it was the duty of Scotchmen to rally round the Unitarian Church, and that it was no stretch of the imagination to realise the fact that there was room for half a dozen Unitarian churches in the great city of Glasgow.

The Rev. J. PAGE HOPPS, in the name of the Glasgow church, gave to the representatives from other Unitarian churches in Scotland a hearty welcome. He was sorry they were so few in number. He had paid a visit to each of their missionary stations except Aberdeen, and, though he regretted to see so little result of so much hard and generous work in the past, he believed something might be done in time, though he counselled them to look for no startling changes. The existence of this association was a necessity, having its origin in their natural desire to make known to others what they felt to be good for themselves, and what they believed others would be the better for. They did not believe that acceptance with God here or hereafter was dependent upon church or creed; but they did believe it was a good thing to have bright and true thoughts of God, the soul, and the future life of man. They had every reason to be encouraged. The better faith was abroad, and opposition to it must be fruitless. Like the boy who nailed the weather-glass at "set fair" when he wanted it to be fine, so theologians and divines sought to fix the future weather in the religious world; but the wind would change in spite of them, and work its will. He earnestly urged the need of persistent, untiring work.

H. C. BRIGGS, Esq. (Dundee), responded to the welcome which had been awarded, and gave an account of the progress made by the Dundee congregation, and invited the members of the association to the next annual meetings, which will be held in Dundee, and, as Mr. Briggs hoped, in the new church which is being built there.

The Rev. J. FREDERICK SMITH spoke to the topic, "The Christianity of Jesus neither a theology nor an ecclesiasticism, but a spirit and a life." He said: It is the privilege of Unitarians to cast off the fetters of the literal text, and to rejoice in the freedom of the spirit. If I, therefore, speak to the spirit rather than the letter of the topic that has been given me, I shall make use of a privilege that we justly boast of. Religion is neither thought nor action, but feeling. It is reverence, trust, peace, and joy. But as pure feeling, it is as a spirit without a body, as colour without outline. Religious feeling, therefore, called to its assistance ideas and expressions. These ideas and expressions formed theology. Religion, too, as feeling, was from its nature communicative and social. We must communicate to others our deepest feelings; and men of similar feeling always seek to have fellowship with each other. Religion, therefore, tended to produce societies, churches, as well as creeds. Now, when the theology and the church were the production of the religious necessities, neither more nor less, then they were full of life and power. But when either was more than the religious feeling had made it, then it sank into dead machinery, being a hindrance to the free movement of the religious life. The religion of Jesus was peace and joy in God. It found its full expression in the creed, the whole of which was comprised in the word "Father." It found its social impulses satisfied in the friendship and discipleship of His followers. The theology and the Church of Jesus were thus the simple satisfaction of the religion of Jesus. The theology was embodied in the words, "Our Father which art in heaven;" the church was simply a band of men and women who felt the attraction to each other which the possession of this theology created. In succeeding ages of Christianity, as we know, additions were made to both the theology and the organisation of Jesus. Generally these additions had not been the creation of the religious life, but the augmentation of the eternal elements around the living centre. As foreign additions, not organic products, these more complex theologies and ecclesiastical systems had fettered, hardened, and destroyed to a great extent the free, simple, living Christian feeling. Of late men had tried to revivify these externals of Christianity, but they had not succeeded. Nothing therefore remained but for us to go back, as Unitarians are doing, to the pure, simple religious feeling which had filled the heart of Jesus. If we go back to the single religion, and leave it to form our theology and our religious associations, our theology and our communion will be the living exponents and products of the external and universal necessities of our religious natures. And this is what men long for. At present, in England, on the Continent, everywhere, the theology and the ecclesiastical organisations of Christianity are not the expression of religion, and, therefore, men feel them to be a difficulty and a bondage that they long to get rid of.

The Rev. J. G. SLATER (Aberdeen), as the representative of the oldest Unitarian congregation in Scotland, briefly addressed the meeting in support of this sentiment.

The Rev. HENRY W. CROSSKEY cordially congratulated the meeting on the progress of the association. It would have been a very painful experience to have found that their long labours together had resulted merely in cherishing personal ties to himself; and he rejoiced that there was so heartily existing among them a love of great principles, which would sustain their work, whether or not he had been succeeded in office by one of acknowledged power.

Be described the spirit in which he had endeavoured to carry on the business of the association. It had or retort with scorn upon the cherished principles of not been their effort to cherish bitter antagonisms, others. They had not opposed notion to notion in the spirit of theological prize-fighting. We must seek out the deeper things of hope and faith, and appeal to the aspirations and prayers of the devout heart, whether it beat beneath the crust of formal creeds or within our own free churches. We must take the love, and poetry, and worship, existing when the Calvinist father reads the Bible to his children as well as in our own community, and show that the deep realities of the same love and poetry and worship may be felt without the peculiarities of creed which divide us, being grander and purer than all antagonisms and related to our common humanity. If we show the Calvinist that we understand the holy spirit of his worship, we may teach him to understand the holy spirit of our own. Mr. Crosskey proceeded to dwell on the higher characteristics of the association's work. By it the worlds of nature and of history were made more intelligible and more dear. He could again and again have sought refuge in silence from the burden of the mystery, but had been sustained by the faith that touched the loftier aspirations of men, united their pure thoughts with their prayers, ministered peace to sorrow, and, amid the shadows of change, on everlasting hopes reposed their souls.

The Rev. ALEXANDER GORDON (Liverpool), having addressed the meeting,

The Rev. THOMAS W. SCOTT (Paisley) proposed the following sentiment: "Unitarian Christianity, founded upon reverence for the perfections of God and respect for the rights and duties of man."

The Rev. H. WILLIAMSON (Dundee), in speaking of this sentiment referred to the great value of the beautiful and ennobling thought of God which Unitarians hold. He appealed to the friends of our Heavenly Father known to those with whom they were brought into contact, who, alas! have not the blessing of believing God to be, at least, as good as a good human mother.

The proceedings, which had been interspersed with sacred music, closed with a vote of thanks to the chairman, proposed by George Hope, Esq.

LONDON AUXILIARY SUNDAY-SCHOOL ASSOCIATION.

THE twenty-first annual meeting of this association was held under the presidency of the Rev. P. W. CLAYDEN, at the Carter Lane Mission, on Wednesday, the 24th November. The meeting was largely attended, and proved one of the most successful which has been held in connection with the society for some time past. Among those present were the Revs. H. IERSON, M.A., Marshall, Spears, Cooper, J. Taylor, Phillips, Heywood, Marten, and C. L. Corkran, and Messrs. F. C. Clarke, H. B. Stannus, F. W. Turner, J. Green, W. N. Green, A. Titford, G. Wells, G. P. Jackson, and Hockley.

In opening the proceedings, the CHAIRMAN remarked that the object of such Associations as these was to organise the activity of Sunday-schools. He often thought of the difference that existed between the ideal Sunday-school and the real one, and in all discussions on the subject it was noticeable that while some were arguing with an ideal school in their mind's eye, others had only the real before them, which was in direct opposition to the ideal, and hence the great divergence of opinion on the matters in discussion. The old Presbyterian idea of no evening service had passed away, and with it the old habit of meeting the children of the family to be catechised and taught. It was a remarkable thing that for 1750 years after the time of Christ there was no such thing as a Sunday-school, and it might be asked, seeing how important to the welfare of our churches and chapels they were, how it was that Christianity had succeeded so well without them? The answer to this was that the necessity for them had not arisen. In bygone times the old catechising by the priest and by the parent had been in vogue, but the pressure of other things had displaced this. The ideal Sunday-school was to "take up the dropped threads" of this work. The actual Sunday-school, however, instead of supplying the deficiencies of the church as it ought to have done, had tried to supply those of the State. And this was a matter of necessity, constituted as the State was; it could not undertake the duty of giving instruction to the young, for there would have been great opposition to hand over the whole juvenile population to the ecclesiastical power. Happily, this state of things is passing away, and when this is done the actual Sunday-school would cease its functions, and the ideal Sunday-school would come into existence. Secular education in Sunday-schools had been, and was now almost a necessity. No doubt the object of Sunday-schools was the religious education of the young, but until the State does its duty, secular education must be given. Another object which should be borne in mind was that of promoting a cordial feeling between the congregation and the school. He then called upon the secretary, Mr. J. W. WADE, to read the annual report.

After alluding to the formation of the society twenty-one years ago, and the fact that since that time the number of our schools in London has more than doubled, and to some changes which have taken place during the year, with grateful mention of the late Rev. J. J. Taylor, the report gave the statistics of the London schools, which will be of general interest to our readers:

If the three schools which have been closed had held their ground, the increase, with the addition of the Clarence Road School, on last year's returns would have been 244 on the books, 92 in the morning attendance, 137 in the afternoon, and 30 teachers; the totals would in that case have been the highest your association ever recorded. It will thus be seen that the majority of the existing schools show signs of slight improvement, whilst the others remain nearly stationary, the only marked exception being Stamford-street, which, owing to the illness through overwork of the Rev. Robert Spears, its superintendent, and the extraordinary exertions made by the Church school in the neighbourhood to entice away the children, shows a considerable reduction in its numbers.

The visitor's report followed, but we prefer to give it entire next week, as it is of real value, rather than to abridge it.

The Rev. H. IERSON moved the adoption of the report, and in doing so congratulated the society on its having attained its majority. It was a matter of pleasure to hear Mr. Wade at any time, even when he censured them, but still more pleasing to hear Mr. Wade when he expressed himself satisfied. In training he had given them was such as they should feel grateful for, and he desired the meeting to express this to Mr. Wade. He could not help noticing the difference which existed between the schools in different localities: while some seemed to flag under circumstances which one would suppose would help them, others seemed to increase and have greater vitality in spite of the difficulties which beset them. He thought we should congratulate the teachers who work under such disadvantages with so much zeal. Organisations were very well, but he could not help thinking that much more depended on the force of individual energy. The attendance at the schools depended much more upon the quality of the teachers than upon their number. In conclusion, he desired to welcome their chairman among them, and to a sphere of usefulness which he was eminently fitted to fill.

Mr. T. C. CLARKE seconded the motion, and in the course of his remarks expressed a hope that we should soon have such a system of national education as should banish from Sunday-schools the necessity of secular education.

The Rev. F. L. MARSHALL rose to explain the circumstances under which the Brixton Sunday-school had been discontinued, which he hoped was only a temporary matter. They had, however, an admirable day-school, and in his opinion a good day-school was worth eight Sunday-schools, for the former has twenty-five hours a week devoted to it while the latter has only three. The children of the congregation are taught in a minister's class. The same difficulty in obtaining children is felt by our American friends, even with their large and flourishing congregations.

Mr. BARTHAM, one of the visitors of the schools, was then called upon to read a paper he had prepared on "How to increase the usefulness of this Association." The following are the principal suggestions which he made:—1. That the teachers of the various schools should meet and exchange ideas upon the work of the Sunday-school. 2. That arrangements should be made, through the medium of the Association, for an occasional interchange of teachers. 3. That the Association should publish a monthly or quarterly journal for teachers. 4. That the school and the congregation should be brought into closer connection.

The CHAIRMAN said this was one of those practical papers, which bore out the remarks he had made in his opening address. An ideal association, such as Mr. Bartram had depicted, ought to do all and more than he stated. There was, however, frequently great difficulty in finding work for an association to do, but he thought that the three things this one did were a sufficient justification for its existence. With regard to the suggestion of more frequent meetings, there was a great difficulty in getting people to come to them. As to the establishment of a journal for teachers, he doubted whether it would be found to pay. The only way in which he could see that the congregation could recognise the school was by making the scholars meet on a footing of equality with the children of the congregation.

Mr. W. N. GREEN said that his experience of Sunday-schools went back considerably beyond the time of the establishment of this association. The meetings of teachers suggested would be of those who are the most useful and zealous, and he thought they might be of great help in Sunday-school work. He referred to the lectures given by the late Rev. J. J. Taylor, which he lamented were so poorly attended. We must pitch the ideal of a Sunday-school high, as this would tend to elevate the character.

The Rev. J. PHILLIPS, in referring to his experience at Manchester, believed there would be a necessity for secular education in the Sunday-school, even under a system of national education.

Mr. TAYLOR (Clerkenwell) mentioned the plan among the Wesleyans of holding such meetings as had been referred to on Sunday evenings, and thought we might adopt it.

The Rev. T. L. MARSHALL hoped the committee would not burn their fingers by rushing into print. Mr. Brooke Herford had tried the plan of a 'teachers' Journal without success, and if he could not do it he did not believe there was any other man better fitted for the work. It would be better to get a column in the Christian Freeman or Unitarian Herald. He suggested the holding an annual meeting of teachers on some distinctive day, such as Good Friday.

The Rev. JOHN TAYLOR supported this suggestion, and spoke of the great good effected by the Manchester Good Friday meeting. He thought it would be wise to bring together the elder scholars as well as the teachers.

Mr. KENNEDY expressed surprise that the things proposed by Mr. Bartram were not already in existence. As to the difficulty of meeting he supported the suggestion to meet on a Sunday. If it was felt that to establish a journal would not pay, and in this commercial age that of course was "a settler," would it not be possible to circulate papers among the different schools as was often done among literary societies?

Mr. STANNUS suggested quarterly meetings of the teachers and the publication of papers in the Unitarian Herald. He was opposed to the meeting on Good Friday, a day connected with an objectionable dogma; he would prefer if he could fix it to meet on the day when Christ set his face towards Jerusalem.

Mr. S. L. GREEN suggested that through this association poor schools might be helped. He complained that there was no treasurer's report.

Mr. WADE explained that the society had no funds, hence the omission. He did not see the advantage of changing the day of meeting to Good Friday. He was in favour of quarterly meetings of the teachers. He referred to the publications of the Parent Society and to the forthcoming issue of Mr. Brooke Herford's "Outline Lessons on the Life of Christ."

Mr. F. W. TURNER thought that the publications of the Parent Society were not enough known, and suggested the sending round to the Metropolitan schools of boxes of books as specimens.

Mr. CORKRAN wished to say that this was not an association for the purpose of promoting Unitarianism, and protested against the assumption of a sectarian name. He thought organisations were a sign of weakness. Life in London was a high-pressure life.

Mr. BARTHAM, in replying, said that his main suggestion—viz., that of more frequent meetings—had been favourably received, and he hoped the committee would endeavour to carry it out. He regretted that Mr. Corkran should have thought fit to introduce a doctrinal tone to the discussion, which neither anything in his paper nor in the remarks which had fallen from the various teachers warranted. He must, however, emphatically assert that to all intents and purposes this was an association of Unitarian Sunday-schools, if it were not it had no reason for its existence, as there was the Sunday-school Union to which they might belong. He for one should not belong to it unless it were a Unitarian association.

The Rev. T. L. MARSHALL reminded the meeting of Sidney Smith's definition of benevolence, namely, A wishing B to relieve C, and on that principle he moved the appointment of Messrs. Wade, Bartram, and Brabner as visitors to his brother ministers' schools. This was seconded by Mr. Stannus, and carried, Mr. Bartram having first desired it to be understood that Mr. Wade had done all the work last year.

The meeting was brought to a close by prayer, the chairman disclaiming all thanks.

INTELLIGENCE.

AN IMPOSTOR.—Friends are warned against a woman who is going about practising a very clever imposition. Her aliases are many; sometimes she goes to the counting-house of a wealthy layman, with a confidential note, purporting to be from one of our ministers, asking for a subscription to a case of urgent need—the money to be sent back by the bearer, who is "one of his servants;" sometimes she is herself collecting for a chapel—but always has a private note of introduction from a minister to the person to whom she applies. Will the first person who can, please hand her over to the police and inform us.

MINISTERIAL APPOINTMENT.—The Rev. H. Calloway, having accepted the pastorate of Penrose-street Chapel, Walworth, will commence his ministerial duties on Sunday, December 12th.

ABERDEEN.—On Wednesday, the 17th ult., the Rev. J. G. Slater gave the first of a series of week-evening lectures, in one of the public halls, the subject being "A statement of Unitarian Belief." About 100 persons, principally strangers, were present. After the lecture, several questions were asked and replied to.

ACCRINGTON.—Rev. W. Mitchell is giving a series of lectures in "Refutation of the Doctrine of Eternal Punishment" in the Chapel on Wednesday evenings, which are exciting considerable interest. At the second lecture, on Wednesday week, the place was crowded, many being unable to gain admittance. These lectures are creating considerable interest; four local papers have given reports of them.

ARDWICK.—On Sunday last the annual school festival took place. The Rev. J. Freeston preached in the morning, and the Rev. S. A. Steintal in the evening, when the congregation was very large. In the afternoon there was a large attendance at the recital. The offertory amounted to £5. On Monday evening 140 parents, teachers, and scholars took tea together, after which Mr. G. J. Taylor presided, and a very pleasant evening was spent.

BIRMINGHAM: HURST-STREET MISSION.—The annual meeting of the Church of the Messiah Ministry to the Poor was held on Monday evening in the Congregational Room of the Church of the Messiah. Notwithstanding a down-pour of rain, snow, and sleet, the room was well filled. After tea Mr. T. Kenrick presided, and amongst those present, in addition to many ladies, were Messrs. W. R. Wills, J. R. Mott, A. B. Phipson, A. Chamberlain, H. F. Osler, R. F. Martineau, W. Kenrick, C. Paget (Nottingham), Dr. Russell, Revs. E. Higginson (Swansea), S. Bache, H. W. Crosskey, and John Wilson. After a few opening remarks by the chairman, in which he spoke of the continuous usefulness of the Mission and the efforts now being made to increase the means of education, the secretary, Mr. W. R. Wills, read the report of the committee and the treasurer's balance sheet. The Rev. John Wilson, the minister of the society, read his annual report.

After describing the aim of the work, and the spirit in which it was prosecuted, allusion was made to the great social questions now agitating the public mind. The condition of the several institutions located at the Mission was then described. These included religious service on Sundays, morning and night, and on Wednesday nights. The congregation was steadily increasing. On Sunday nights it ranged from one to two hundred adults. On Wednesdays from sixty to eighty adults. The musical services had been improved by the addition of an organ during the year. The Sunday-schools were improving in order, and increasing in usefulness. The numbers were: Girls, 140; boys, 190. The average attendance for the year was 245 in the morning, and 263 in the afternoon. The night classes, mothers' meeting, and temperance societies had been continued as usual. The day schools included 339 scholars, with an average weekly attendance of 154 in the infant school, and 109 in the upper schools. The children's dinner, supplied at the suggestion and cost of Mr. Joseph Chamberlain, jun., had been more largely attended than in any preceding year. They were supplied during nearly three months of the coldest weather to poor children—most of them occupied in workshops. One thousand and twenty dinners had been supplied. The receipts in the savings club had been larger than in former years. They were £163.4s.9d. The repayments amounted to £148.16s.6d. The number of deposits was 4,467, and the repayments amounted to 395. The deposits in the Sunday School Savings Club amounted to £71.1s.8d., and the repayments to £68.8s.6d. The social meetings and treats included a trip to Dudley, and also a day trip to Liverpool. The various business of the meeting, the adoption of the reports, election of officers, &c., was then transacted, addresses being given by most of the friends named above.

EAST LANCASHIRE UNITARIAN MISSION.—The treasurer of this society has received a donation of £100 from the executors of the late Mr. Robert Heywood, of Bolton, who was from the commencement of the mission one of its most constant supporters.

MANCHESTER: HULME DOMESTIC MISSION.—The first anniversary sermons in the new premises, Embden-street, were preached on Sunday week; that in the morning by the Rev. G. H. Wells, M.A., and that in the evening by the Rev. James Drummond, B.A. The congregations were large, and the collections amounted to over £18.—On the Monday evening following a congregational tea party was held, about two hundred persons present. After tea the chair was taken by the minister, the Rev. J. Harrop. A report was read by Mr. John Barnes, secretary for the Sunday-school, in which it was stated that the Mutual Improvement Society, the recreation and entertainment classes, as well as several other evening institutions, for the instruction of both males and females, were in a flourishing condition. The Sunday-school had considerably increased during the year, while the day-school had more than doubled its numbers in that time, and so necessitated the appointment of an efficient certificated mistress. Since last November to the present time there had been a steady increase in the congregation, and the evening offertory, which had been introduced on the first Sunday in January, including the collections at annual sermons, already exceeded £50. Various articles had been bought, and projects entered upon with a view to the increased usefulness of the Mission, by the workers and worshippers in connection with it, involving an expense of upwards of £50 more. The meeting was subsequently addressed by the Chairman, by the Revs. T. E. Poynting, James Black, W. H. Herford, B.A., Benjamin Walker, and by Mr. John Chadwick, the Sunday-school visitor. The proceedings of the evening were agreeably interspersed with readings, songs, and glees; and concluded with a hymn and the benediction.

MANCHESTER: PICKSTONE-STREET MEETING-HOUSE.—The first tea party in connection with this place of worship was held on Monday evening last, to inaugurate a band of hope; 110 children and friends partook of tea, and the number increased to 130 afterwards. Mr. J. E. Benson, president of the band, occupied the chair, and delivered an excellent opening address. Telling speeches were also made by Messrs. C. H. Branscomb, (the United States Consul), William Touchstone, and Thomas Howe. The Rev. Joseph Freeston was also present. Select pieces were sung by the chapel choir, and recitations and songs given by the children and other friends.

SHEFFIELD: UPPER CHAPEL SUNDAY-SCHOOLS.—On Tuesday evening week the usual fair treat was given to the children. After tea, many of the parents being present, the children recited appropriate pieces and sang a few songs very creditably. Mr. Chadburn added to the enjoyment by his magic lantern exhibition. John Hobson, Esq., gave a short and interesting account of the schools as they were forty-five years ago; and the chairman (the Rev. J. Lettis Short), in speaking of the decorations of the room, drew attention to the coloured pictures hung on the walls. Part of these pictures are published by the Religious Tract Society, and the others are supplements of the Illustrated London News, choice having been made of those which teach a good moral; the whole are mounted, bound, and varnished.

POOLE CHAPEL.

To the Editors.—May I be permitted to add my very earnest appeal to your own, and to that of the Rev. John Cropper, in behalf of the funds requisite to pay off the comparatively small remaining debt on the new Poole Chapel, an amount which, small as it is, the congregation are unable themselves to raise, and which seriously impedes their settlement with a minister and their power to push forward. I can testify, as a secretary of the Southern Unitarian Fund Society, and a visitor at Poole for a series of years, to the zeal and persevering activity of the members of the congregation. They have, indeed, in their determination to raise a chapel, made greater efforts and done more than we could have hoped they would have done. And long have they gathered together for worship without the aid of a pastor. All honour to their new lay preacher, Mr. Balston, and to others who have worked with him. Would that every congregation under similar circumstances would manifest the same religious consistency! They have indeed my very hearty sympathy and congratulations in their successful efforts to raise a Sunday-school. In addition to my interest for Poole itself, I have felt the great importance of Unitarian worship there, from its proximity to Bournemouth, four miles only distant, and to which many Unitarians every year resort as a watering place, to whom the distance will be nothing when the railway shall connect the two towns.—Hoping that generous and simultaneous contributions will respond to our appeals, I remain, yours respectfully, EDMUND KELL.

MEADOW CHAPEL, GODALMING.
The Committee of the above Chapel have determined to supply the want, which has long been felt, of greater accommodation for their Sunday-schools, and of a room suitable for congregational purposes, meetings, and lectures. For this purpose upwards of £200 has been raised by the congregation, and another £100 is required that the new building may be opened free from debt in April, 1870. The Committee now confidently appeal to the Unitarian public to assist them in raising this sum. Subscriptions will be thankfully received and duly acknowledged by the Secretary, EDWIN ELLIS, Womersley, Guildford.

THE UNITARIAN CHAPEL, POOLE.
This neat and commodious Chapel, erected at a cost of £2000, including a magnificent Schoolroom, has been opened. There is the prospect of a not inconsiderable congregation being gathered were it practicable to secure the services of a zealous and able pastor. The debt which hangs over the place, £310, must be paid before this object can be attained.

The undersigned, having been present at the opening service, and being cognisant of the capabilities of the congregation and its prospects, respectfully recommend the case to the attention and help of the Unitarian body, believing it to be on every account deserving of the assistance asked. Donations may be forwarded to any of us, or to Mr. Alfred Balston, Poole.

DR. S. DAVIDSON,
JAS. RICHARDSON, } Hon. Secs.
178, Strand, December, 1869.

LONGTON.—The Unitarian congregation meeting in this town are very desirous to erect a more suitable place of worship than the one they at present have. For a long time they have had to hold their religious services in a room of a public-house, situated in a back street. The success of the Unitarian cause is injured, in this part of the country, by the building in which its claims are advocated. It is often said, if there were a chapel instead of a public-house room to meet in, many persons who sympathise with us would attend the services.

There is another consideration which urges the congregation to get a place worthy of the views they hold of the religion of Jesus Christ. At present there is no Sunday-school in connection with the society, as the person who lets the room for the religious services will not allow it to be used for a Sunday-school.

Longton is a rapidly increasing municipal town in the Staffordshire potteries. It also forms part of the parliamentary borough of Stoke-upon-Trent. Collected around the site of the proposed chapel at a very short distance there is a population of thirty thousand inhabitants: a wide field here presents itself to those who are engaged in teaching the pure and simple doctrine of the Gospel.

The congregation is composed chiefly of working people; they have, as stated above, secured a site, and they have contributed according to their means towards building a place of worship, the cost of which they estimate at about £500.

As the congregation earnestly feel that there is a reasonable prospect of much more good being done if they had a chapel of their own, they therefore cast themselves upon the generosity of their Unitarian brethren to assist in erecting one, and they appeal to the kindness of all those who are desirous to promote the success of liberal Christianity and the religious instruction of the young.

The following gentlemen will be Trustees in conjunction with other gentlemen living in the locality:—
George Melly, Esq., M.P., Rev. Brooke Herford, Manchester.
Rev. Benjamin Glover, Crews, Rev. Robert Spars, London.

In addition to the following subscriptions which have been promised, two gentlemen will give £100 providing the remaining sum of £400 be raised:—

WHAT THE CHURCHES ARE DOING.

A church for the Evangelical congregation at Jerusalem is to be erected on the ground formerly belonging to the Order of the Knights of St. John, which was presented to the King of Prussia during the late visit of the Crown Prince to Constantinople.

The German painter Kaulbach is said to be engaged in the composition of a picture representing our Saviour driving the speculators and self-seekers out of the Œcumenical Council, as he once drove the money-changers out of the Temple.

The Roman correspondent of a German paper describes the state of feeling existing in Italy with regard to the Œcumenical in terms which agree well with representations which we ourselves have received. The Italian press in general, he says, take as little notice of it "as if it were a meeting summoned by the Mikado (of Japan) to canonise some new Kamis." "The pastorals of the bishops, mostly brief and somewhat vague on the one side, and the proclamations of the so-called freethinkers on the other, confront each other without anything like transition or mediation." The writer accounts for this by the fact that Liberal Catholicism, properly so called, does not exist in Italy; there is merely, on the one hand, "the presumed orthodox faith," and on the other "a species of coarse materialism, as blind and unreasoning as superstition itself." No one can reside there, even for a short time, without being made painfully aware of this.

According to the Roman correspondent of the Times, it does not seem likely that the prelates now gathered in council will exactly realise one's idea of a happy family. As our references to the work of Bishop Maret, and the letters of Monsignor Dupanloup and the Archbishop of Paris, must have made our readers aware, there is promise of a strong Gallican opposition to the Papal party; a large proportion of the German bishops take the same side; and with regard to the Italians, the Times' correspondent states that while "some will be subservient enough, the majority are said to be suspending their judgment with a caution and a method rather alarming to the Holy See." As we have mentioned before, it has not been with Cardinal Antonelli's goodwill that the Council has been summoned at all, and his aim now will be, by bringing into play those wily arts of which he is such a master, to keep dangerous questions from being stirred, or, if that may not be, from receiving too sharp and formal a definition. This, no doubt, will be a grievous disappointment to the British and American prelates, who seem foremost of the Ultramontane party, and whose great hope from the Council has been that it would "proclaim in the accurate words of a dogmatic definition the personal infallibility of the successor of St. Peter."

The Council of the Vatican was opened on Wednesday with great pomp. The Pope was borne in his state chair into St. Peter's, at the head of a procession, consisting of 6 archbishop princes, 49 cardinals, 11 patriarchs, 680 archbishops and bishops, 28 abbots, and 29 generals of religious orders. After mass had been chanted by Cardinal Fabrizzi, the Archbishop of Iconium delivered the inaugural discourse; and his Holiness invoked the aid of the Holy Ghost for the Council three times, and gave the Benediction.

The same day, the Italian Liberals were to hold meetings at Palermo, Catania, Salerno, Aquila, Foggia, Ancona, Parma, Venice, Verona, Brescia, Treviso, and some other places, at which resolutions were to be proposed declaring war against the Papal system, and affirming the principles of liberty of conscience.

Not unnaturally, Welsh Churchmen feel aggrieved that their bishops should be chosen, not from their own countrymen, but from among the English and Scotch clergy, who are unacquainted with the language and customs of the people over whom they have to preside. This feeling has found vent in a remonstrance addressed to Mr. Gladstone on the subject, and he has replied that, "should a vacancy unhappily occur, the matter shall have his serious consideration."

The Evangelical clergyman of Bishopwearmouth, with a salary of £2,000 a year, and a handsome rectory to live in, does not, if we may judge from a statement in the Newcastle Chronicle, appear to have done much in calling out a readiness to contribute to the wants of the church. The churchwardens have given the bell-ringers, organist, and pew-openers a three months' notice of the termination of their engagements, owing to an "insufficiency of income;" the congregation having declined either to furnish voluntary contributions or to pay a levy of twopence a week for seat rents!

We are glad to find Oxford following the lead of Cambridge in regard to University Tests. At a meeting, presided over by Dr. Liddell, the Dean of Christ Church, at which eighty were present, and among them some of the most distinguished members of the University, resolutions were moved by Dr. Wayte, the President of Trinity, Mr. Jowett, Sir Benjamin Brodie, and the Rev. C. W. Sandford, in favour of a compulsory removal of tests, in preference to the Permissive Bill of Sir John Coleridge. The Lords last Session would hardly deign to look at this; before long, there can be little doubt, they will, as in so many other instances, be convicted of short-sightedness in not quietly accepting it.

One of the profane might be tempted to say that what took place at St. Alban's, as the closing scene of the Twelve Days' Mission, was making light of religion. The church was densely crowded. The whole of the centre part was raised off for the penitents, the men being placed on the one side and the women on the other. After some introductory services the Rev. S. W. O'Neill, a member of the Society of St. John the Evangelist, ascended the pulpit. Before this he had acted the part of a Father Confessor to several young persons of both sexes, for which purpose a little box had been erected in the corner of the church. In explaining the nature of the service of that evening he stated that a number of candles were to be blessed, and then handed to the penitents. He said that what was not consumed of the candles after the evening's ceremony might be taken home, and should be kept to the hour of death, when it would comfort them to remember how they had confessed Christ before men. After blessing the candles at the altar Mr. O'Neill called upon the penitents to respond to the questions from the Book of Common Prayer in a bold and manly way, and not as though they were ashamed of them. Let them speak out, so that the church might be glorified and the devil tremble. In a minute or two afterwards about 500 lighted wax candles, each about a foot in length, were brought in and given to as many men and women. As the penitents, thus armed, were drawn up in the body of the church, it was a blaze of light, while the chancel was nearly dark. While all this was going on the penitents, as they are called, were singing a penitential hymn. The Revs. Mr. Mackonochie, Walker, and other Ritualist leaders next headed the band of men, women, and boys, and the procession, the members of which still continued to carry the candles and to sing hymns, moved round the church. This extraordinary display was wound up by the pronouncing of a blessing.

The organisation of the Irish Episcopal Church is not proceeding so smoothly as it at first promised to do. Two points of difference have arisen between the clergy and the laity, and are causing no little agitation. One is that the latter insist upon having a majority of votes in the governing body; the other is that the bishops are resolved to sit in a separate chamber, and to have a veto on the proceedings of the Lower one. This, the laity contend, would give the clergy a power which they are not willing to yield; and, on the other hand, the bishops (the John Bull informs us) are unanimous in their resolution to maintain the position they have assumed.

The Rev. Henry Hyman, the head of Bradfield College, has been appointed Dr. Temple's successor in the Mastership of Rugby. He is said to be a High Churchman, and his appointment the result of a determination on the part of the trustees to clear the school from any suspicion of heterodoxy. The Daily News, which thinks it would be difficult to imagine a more flagrant instance of the necessity of State supervision and control over educational institutions which have become national in their influence, and significantly asks, "Is it or is it not the case that the head master whom they have chosen out of several competitors had only three testimonials for Rugby itself, and that the rest were testimonials given on other occasions, and without the permission of the writers?"

An important conference of Wesleyans on the education question, at which upwards of a hundred and fifty representative ministers and laymen, from all parts of the kingdom, were present, has just been held in London. Much stronger opposition was shown to the denominational system than had been expected. It was urged that this had proved inefficient to supply the educational wants of a large proportion of the lowest and most needy classes of the population; that it had enabled the clergy of the Established Church to exert upon other classes in the country, especially in rural districts, an undue influence; that it also placed in the hands of the Roman Catholic party large sums of money which were directly used for the maintenance of their politico-religious tenets and power; that the continuance of the system in England would most probably lead to its extension to Ireland, where it would certainly be used for sectarian purposes; and also the benefits which Methodism had derived, or could derive, from it, were not a sufficient offset against its disadvantages. On the other hand, it was contended that the deficiencies and faults of the existing system had been greatly exaggerated by its opponents; that the residuum of children for whose education provision had not been made was much smaller than alleged; that the denominational system, so far as Methodism was concerned, had been cramped in its operations by the restrictions which Government had placed on building grants; that even now the rendering Denison's Act compulsory would bring into existing schools the greater part of the neglected classes; that the system had conferred great moral and religious benefits upon scholars, the loss of which could not be counterbalanced by any arrangements yet proposed; that the many thousands of school properties created on trusts for religious education could not be confiscated; that it was most improbable that the Roman Catholic party would consent to any national system of Bible-reading schools for England, much less for Ireland; and that any system which had been suggested might, under given circumstances, be used for objectionable purposes. Various resolutions were proposed, but decision upon them was postponed to a subsequent meeting.

The ceremony of Dr. Temple's confirmation took place on Wednesday in the church of St. Mary-le-Bow. Counsel were allowed to appear for Bishop Trower and other remonstrants, and long and tedious arguments followed; but the Vicar-General (Sir Travers Twiss) decided that the statute gave him no discretion, and that he was bound to confirm the election in obedience to the mandate of the Crown; which he accordingly did. The matter will now, it is said, be carried into the Court of Queen's Bench; and Dr. Temple's opponents will thus have the satisfaction of harassing him a little further; for even they, we imagine, cannot expect their opposition to have any effect beyond that.

WHAT IS SAYING ON CHURCH MATTERS.

Dr. Döllinger, the learned Roman Catholic professor of Munich, who, while loyal to his Church, tries to be loyal likewise to truth, has just published a pamphlet, addressed to the Catholic bishops of Germany, on the doctrine of Papal Infallibility. In which he points out how the adoption of this doctrine, arrived at, as it indisputably has been, by continuous fabrications, must necessarily weaken the respect of the laity for the Church. "The fabrications," he says, "by which this doctrine was prepared, recommended, and finally introduced into the scholastic theology and law books, extend from the sixth century to the thirteenth, and even St. Thomas of Aquinas, whose authority has contributed so much to its spread and confirmation was deceived by the fabricated evidence of the Greek Church."

Rationalism is creeping in among the Jews, as well as among Christians. One of them writes thus to the Jewish Chronicle:

"I attended the Portland-street Synagogue last Sabbath, and was much surprised at the character of the sermon that was delivered on that occasion. As an Israelite I have always been taught to believe, and to be convinced of, the sacred truth of our Bible, but to my very great astonishment I heard, for the first time in my life, that the struggle between Jacob and the angel was only a vision. If so, why are we forbidden to eat the hind quarter of the animals to this very day? And, further, another strange piece of intelligence, that the passage over the Red Sea was but a natural occurrence, and not a miracle. Then why do we keep and celebrate the redemption from Egypt? Again, that Balaam's ass did not speak; that, also, was only a vision. Consequently, the whole history of Balaam and Balak was only a fabrication. And last of all came the daring, startling, and dangerous assertion that God never spoke at all, it was only a vision of Moses. Further, we were told that the water flowing from the rock, and the earth swallowing Korah and his company, were not miracles—that all were in perfect harmony with nature. As a member of the synagogue, I hereby protest against such heterodox principles being introduced into the synagogue."

In one of his recent addresses at Liverpool Mr. Foster expressed his belief that the prevarication of the clergy in the matter of subscriptions and tests had had no little to do with producing the flagrant commercial dishonesty which is bringing so much discredit on England and so much loss to the countless victims of fraud. The English Independent thinks:

"The opinion may attract more serious attention when uttered by a minister of the crown than when expressed in Nonconformist journals, which are supposed to be prompted by spite and envy. The clergy who are practising these deceptions are quite unaware either of the sinfulness or the mischief; but if they would but set themselves fairly to find out how they look to outsiders, they would be shocked—at least we hope they would."

And, as a first contribution to their collection of opinions, the Independent presents them with the following from the Pall Mall:

"Sophistry which would be inexcusable in a lawyer arguing in favour of life, distortions of meaning which would be inadmissible where the object was to defeat the grossest injustice arising from the obvious interpretation of a contract—all these 'dodges,' and many more, become sanctified where the purpose is to justify ourselves in remaining in communion with a church which we either fancy we can reform or do not wish to leave. Such was the policy initiated thirty years ago in the famous Tract number Ninety, and it is a policy continually renewed whenever any fresh innovation on the ordinary opinions or practices prevalent in the Protestant Church of England is contemplated."

A correspondent of the Freeman having wished to know what had become, since his illness, of Thomas Cooper (author of the "Purgatory of Suicides," and at one time a lecturer against Christianity), he writes in reply:

"I trust I am doing a little good in the world—at least I am trying to do a little, and wish I could do more. But—do you know?—I cannot help entertaining a suspicion that some good sort of people think I ought to consider that it is time for me to 'retire'—as genteel folks say when they give up business. I was pronounced to be dead about a year and a-half ago, and 'biographies' of me, two or three columns long, and of a not very truthful stamp, were inserted in the newspapers of the Midland Counties. Ever since that time I have felt a deepening impression that many people think I have lived long enough, and ought, almost, to be ashamed of myself for living so long—although I am not yet sixty-five! I am confirmed in this uneasy impression by the kind of replies that I get from some Christian friends (after writing to them two or three times before I can get any reply at all), that they cannot lend me their chapels for my lectures—or, they would rather I deferred my visit till another year—or, they see no necessity for the delivery of lectures on the evidences of Christianity in the hearing of the young men who are members of churches and teachers in Sunday-schools! Such replies sound to me like, 'Go to bed, sir! You are no longer wanted; you are used up!' Permit me to inform such of these, no doubt, well-meaning friends, as happen to read this letter, that I am not of their opinion. I have no fancy for dying—at least, at present; and I shall not make myself miserable by turning idler. I preach twice every Sunday, and lecture four times every week; and, by the Lord's good help, I mean to go on at the same rate of work until He gives me unmistakable order to stop."

The Daily News reminds us that the synodical condemnation of "Essays and Reviews" by Convocation, of which so much is made by Dr. Temple's opponents, was dealt with by Lord Westbury when he occupied the woolsack, in the month of July, 1864. "If," said his lordship, "the book had been the work of one hand, the sentence might have had some effect; but seeing that the book is nothing but a pair of covers holding together seven separate essays, being the distinct works of so many authors, and seeing that this sentence does not attribute any offence to anything but the volume containing those separate writings, no one of the authors is condemned. Convocation could not have been more successful if they had synodically sat down to produce a sentence of no meaning than they were when in their labour they produced this ridiculous mus. As a judgment this sentence has no meaning whatever—this judgment is no judgment at all."

One cannot help being reminded by the decision in the Mackonochie case of the mighty difference 'twixt tweedledum and tweedledee. The Telegraph thinks that in such a case obedience to the law is not a question of inches in the height to which the hands are lifted and the extent to which the knee is bent, or of minutes in the extinction of candles. If the battle at St. Alban's is to be fought over such trumpery expedients on the part of the defeated party, the Ritualists will become more than a nuisance—they will be broadly accused of Jesuitical subterfuges.—While allowing that Mr. Mackonochie's evasions are pitiful enough, the Daily News asks, but is not the whole question of ceremonial a small one? The doctrines of the real presence, and of confession and absolution, are worth striving about; but it is humiliating to find the most distinguished of our judges sitting to decide upon the difference of a few inches in the elevation of a cup, or whether bending the knee is kneeling.—The Times regards the case as exhibiting the real spirit of the Ritualists. They were wont loudly to boast that they, and they alone, were fully acting up to the Rubrics and other ordinances of the Prayer Book.—The result of the first formal trial to which they have been challenged is that five of their most distinctive practices are condemned as inconsistent with the Prayer Book. And it becomes them now to consider whether their position is consistent with their own self-respect, and whether they can expect that it will be tolerated by the country.

A learned friend, who thinks we were "rather too hard" upon the editor of Le Monde in our last number, writes to us:

"I believe he is right in saying that Sixtus V. was the first who conceived the idea of cutting through the Isthmus of Suez. What the native Egyptian sovereigns, the Persians, the Macedonians, attempted or accomplished, was something very different, cutting a canal from a branch of the Nile to the Bitter Lakes and thence to the Red Sea. This is a very different thing from cutting through the Isthmus. I am sure you would wish to do justice to a brother editor, though an Ultramontane, and will be glad to find that in this instance the 'Father of History' has not been misled."

At St. Augustine's, Bighbury, the Rev. G. Calthorp, an eminent Evangelical, testified strongly against the Twelve Days' Mission. He said the preachers in many cases might and did set forth Christ, but afterwards, in the intervention of the confessional and the priest, the teaching of the pulpit was practically negated. And then the end—the blessing, lighting, and parading of the candles by the penitents—the candle-ends to be kept as the comforts of a dying hour! The thing moved his indignation—it was so puerile, so blasphemous. Warmly as he was attached to the Church of England, it made him hang down his head for a Church in which such things were practised.—At St. Botolph's, Bishopsgate, at the same time the Broad Church was speaking in the person of the Rev. W. Rogers. He would not deny the zeal, earnestness, and power with which that movement had been sustained. But two fundamental errors—the doctrine of auricular or private confession, and that of the bodily presence of Christ in the sacrament—gave a taint to the whole work. "He felt that these doctrines, which tended to exalt unduly the office of the priesthood, were just those which were most contrary to the principles of the Church of England, and that if they were to prevail, then the Reformation for which our fathers bled and died was stultified."

The Pall Mall thinks that the Chancellor of York has either not understood Mr. Voysey's defence, or, with commendable discretion, he has left the points which it raises intact for the decision of a higher tribunal. It is very difficult to believe that this remarkable argument proceeded, as he seems to suppose, from an "amiable" but misguided clergyman, who is to be pitied for not having had legal assistance. For if one thing is clearer about it than another, it is that it is strictly relevant to the issue which the court had to try. Mr. Voysey states, with absolute correctness, that the question for the court was, not whether he had denied doctrines which are generally or partially received among Christians, but whether he had denied the specific doctrines of the Church of England; which doctrines he affirms to be, in the view of the law, exclusively contained in the Thirty-nine Articles. Not only does he assert that he has never affirmed any doctrine enunciated in the Articles to be untrue, but he asseverates that he believes every such doctrine. What he denies, and claims the right to deny, is a set of popular glosses or interpretations put upon these doctrines by persons not in any way authorised by law to explain, vary, or amplify them. It may be laid down with some confidence that, if the Court of Appeal confirms the Chancellor's judgment, it will pay great attention and respect to the defendant's reasoning; and it may be guessed that, if he is condemned, it will be because the higher court is of opinion that he has somehow contradicted, or (as the lawyers say) traversed, the particular propositions of the Articles. An even safer prediction is that the Privy Council will not charge Mr. Voysey, as does the Chancellor, with having adopted the opinions of Arius, or of the Pantheists, or of the German metaphysicians. Not to speak of the utter absurdity of fixing the imputation of heresy on all the metaphysicians of Germany alike, or of discovering anything in common between Pantheism and the views of a gentleman whose objection to the opinions which he disputes is almost exclusively that they seem to him irreconcilable with the necessary attributes of an all-beneficent personal God, a competent tribunal will assuredly consider metaphysics and Pantheism no more germane to the true question than the creed of the Sakhya sect of Hindoos, and it will as little dream of referring to the doctrines of Arius as to those of Buddha.

At the Oxford meeting for the removal of University tests, Sir Benjamin Brodie spoke thus well on the subject:

"While he was anxious to extend the advantages of the University in the fullest sense to every class of the community, yet this he held was not the only, nor even the most real, end to be attained by the abolition of tests, for the principle of the imposition of tests and their effects on the persons on whom they were imposed were alike contrary to public and private morality. To make important pecuniary advantages contingent upon a declaration of moral and religious belief was to associate together two things which it was the very essence of morality to keep distinct. They had recently heard a great deal from high quarters as to the importance of not placing stumbling-blocks in the way of conscientious men; but what, he would ask, was to be thought of those persons who, at a certain epoch, made the sum of the benefits which a young man was to reap in the University from his previous ability and industry to depend entirely upon his expressing his unfeigned and immediate assent to a scheme of religious doctrine? He would ask whether this was a proper opportunity for inviting a young man to form an absolute and final conclusion upon his religious belief? Free choice and unbiassed conviction were the very essence of religion. But more, he would say that no man for this or any other object should attempt to pledge himself permanently to the convictions of the moment. The search for truth was amongst the highest of the duties of an intelligent being, but no man can search with much advantage if serious penalties are to be attached to a change of opinion."

Punch has this on "the price of persecution":

"The Athenæum says:—'It appears to have cost the Government of Mary £1. 5s. 2d. to burn the two martyrs, Latimer and Ridley. How cheap! And now the poor High Church and Low Church parsons can't get one of the Broad Church burnt for love or money; and not only are they unable to send him to the stake, but must go to the expense of above a thousand pounds if they only endeavour, when they generally fail, to bring him to book.'"

SHORT REVIEWS.

Memorials of the Presbyterian Chapel, St. Saviour-gate, York. By John Kenrick, M.A. London: Whitfield.

At the time when Mr. Kenrick favoured us with the original sketch of these Memorials, we felt that the space which we could allow for it was quite insufficient to enable him to do justice to the materials at his command, and we are glad that he has been induced to throw them into their present form. While in the minds of old York students they serve more especially to call up touching reminiscences of bygone days, no one we think could study without interest the historical details which are given. We only wish that we had as correct and careful accounts of all our other leading Presbyterian chapels; and it would then be seen what an important part the high-principled men that once worshipped in them have had in endowing us with our civil and religious privileges, and in moulding society into its present form.

Among the accounts which Mr. Kenrick gives of the ministers of St. Saviour-gate, that of Mr. Edward Bowles, whose Catechism was so often referred to in the Lady Hewley case, is particularly full and interesting. He appears to have been a man of extraordinary talent for affairs, and to have exerted no mean influence amidst the stirring scenes of the eventful times in which he lived. When Lord Fairfax was at his seat in Wharfedale, to which political intelligence was not speedily transmitted, Mr. Bowles, having readier communication with the metropolis, kept him informed of the proceedings of the Parliament and the army. Through the esteem in which he was held by the ruling powers, he enabled the magistracy of York to defeat a proposal for diverting to other purposes a part of the revenues of the Minster allotted for the maintenance of the fabric; he was in confidential correspondence with Secretary Thurloe; and when it was essential to Monk, on his march from Scotland to the metropolis in 1660, to obtain admission into York, Mr. Bowles's influence with the magistrates and citizens greatly contributed to it. During the five days that the General remained in York the intercourse between them seems to have been of a very confidential kind, and on the Sunday Mr. Bowles preached before him. Like most of the Presbyterians, he was in favour of the restoration of monarchy; and when it was determined upon, he went with Lord Fairfax, Calamy, and Manton to Breda. What followed we must give in Mr. Kenrick's own words:

How far they were deceived by the King and Clarendon, how far blinded by their own animosity to the Independents and Republicans, it is difficult to decide; but it is certain that they were bitterly disappointed by the result, and that Mr. Bowles and his colleagues were reproached by their party for the credulity with which they had received the specious words of Charles. Mr. Bowles had especial cause for repentance, as no man had been more instrumental in promoting the King's restoration. It is not impossible that grief and vexation contributed to his early death. On the 29th of May, 1715, when the kingdom was about to be invaded by the Old Pretender, the celebrated Independent minister, the Rev. Thomas Bradbury, preached a sermon which he afterwards published under the ironical title of "Εἰκὼν βασιλική, a Restoration Sermon." The text is Hosea vii., 7, "All their kings are fallen; there is none that calleth unto me;" and an appendix contains several papers relating to the restoration in 1660. At page 33 it is said, "when Mr. Bowles saw what impiety and sorrow were coming upon the nation, the prospect drove him out of London, and perhaps out of the world. The last visit he made in town was to his old acquaintance the Duke of Albemarle (Monk). He talked to him to this purpose: 'My Lord, I have buried the good old cause, and I am now going to bury myself. I never expect to see your Grace more in this world, and therefore must be plain to say, that you have had greater opportunities than any other person to make the king happy and the people easy, and all this you have given up for a feather in your cap, a little trifling honour. But the Lord says of you, as he said of Coniah (Jerem. xxii., 30), 'Write this man childless, a man that shall not prosper in his days: none of his seed shall prosper.' This title will be mentioned with a reproach to yourself, and after your son has had it a little while it will go out in a snuff.' [The Duke-dom of Albemarle became extinct in 1688.] That day the good man went homewards, and was met at Doncaster by several of the ministers in that county, and as one of the company told me himself, he bewailed what he had done, exhorted them to take care that they did not make shipwreck of faith and a good conscience, and in a little time after died at York delivering these words, not long before his death, 'Thou wast a God that forgavest their iniquities, though thou tookest vengeance on their inventions.' When this last passage was told to the Duke it gave him a great commotion, and he spoke like a person in sore distress, 'This was a man of God, and none of his words shall fall to the ground.'"

Hephzibah: a Christmas Story for Children. By Lucy Field. London: Griffiths and Farran, St. Paul's Churchyard. 1869.

We remember Miss Field's name as the author of some pleasing novels which appeared about fifteen years ago, but this is the first time (so far as we know) that she has written for children. We hope it will not be the last, for this is an excellent little tale, with a spice of romance in the plot, yet thoroughly homely and childlike in detail. We recommend our readers to make the acquaintance of Hephzibah, and the silver-white pigeon to which she owed so much, and shall be glad to hear more of her adventures when the author favours us with the promised sequel.

CURSES IN DISGUISE.

"A MINISTER of Religion," in reading an article in the Pall Mall Gazette on this subject, bethought him of some notes which he made in 1858, when a revival was sweeping through American cities, and the great object of pious animosity was Theodore Parker. He says:

"On one occasion during the revival a prayer-meeting was held for the especial purpose of 'praying for Parker.' The first brother called upon to 'lead in prayer' said, 'O Lord, if this man is a subject of grace, convert him, and bring him into the kingdom of Thy dear Son. But if he is beyond the reach of the saving influence of the gospel, remove him out of the way and let his influence die with him.' A second saint prayed, 'O Lord, send confusion and distraction into his study this afternoon'—it was Saturday—and prevent his finishing his preparations for his labours to-morrow. Or if he shall attempt to desecrate Thy holy day by attempting to speak to the people, meet him there, Lord, and confound him.' In the intervals of prayer an exhorter asked those present to pray that 'God would put a hook in his (Parker's) jaw, so that he might not be able to speak.' Among many other memoranda which I made at the time, one prayer deserves to be quoted for its naïveté: 'O Lord,' prayed this brother, 'we know that we cannot argue him down, and the more we say against him the more will the people flock after him. O Lord, what shall be done for Boston if Thou dost not take this and some other matters in hand!' When not very long after Parker was struck with a fatal illness, there were not wanting some of the participants in the meeting referred to, who believed that the prayers offered in it had influenced the course of Providence."

FATHER HYACINTHE.

A FEW extracts from a sketch of the great Carmelite preacher by Dr. E. de Pressensé, can hardly fail, we think, to interest our readers. He says:

"From the moment that Father Hyacinthe appeared in the pulpit of Notre Dame, every one felt that there was a new inspiration in his words, such as never came from Rome. I shall always remember the first time I heard him. I knew nothing of him. I only knew in a vague manner that a new preacher was the subject of general remark, whose talents, it was said, were creating a sensation. I chanced one Sunday to enter the cathedral. The sermon was already begun. But I was at once impressed by his diction, which was full of fire and beauty. It breathed moreover a loving freedom and charity. I was specially impressed with the fact that the preacher said nothing of the peculiar dogmas of his Church, while he proclaimed Jesus Christ with rare power. This charity seemed the more remarkable in him, inasmuch as he wore the dress of the Carmelites, of all religious orders one of the narrowest and most subservient to an inflexible rule.

"So deeply was I impressed that the same evening, being present at a meeting of our Evangelical Alliance, I told my brethren that a few hours before I had felt that our association ought to embrace, not merely the sons of the Reformation, but also the Christian party among the Catholics. I also spoke enthusiastically of the preaching of Father Hyacinthe. That was five years ago.

"From that time he has more than fulfilled his early promise. In that same pulpit of Notre Dame he has done better than I anticipated. His sermons have often been most earnest protests against modern Pharisaism, while they have all manifested the warmest appreciation of all that is high and holy in evangelical Protestantism. The last year his discourses have been characterised by a more emphatic earnestness and charity. He has boldly planted his flag on the heights of an evangelical Catholicity, which spurns all arbitrary rules and acknowledges no authority but that of Jesus Christ. Undoubtedly he still held views which prevented him from breaking openly with the Church, but all his blows told. They told so effectually that admonitions from Rome came thick and fast. The Ultramontane press in Paris kept an ominous silence, and it was easy to see that in no long time a rupture must take place. In fact, Father Hyacinthe was ordered to Rome to receive a fatherly admonition. Nothing was said in the way of reproach; he contented himself therefore with receiving the admonition in silence. But the cup was full; one drop more would make it overflow.

"The effect of the Holy City of Popery on a mind beginning to shake off the chains of religious despotism is always to hasten its emancipation. It has no attraction for any but blind devotees. In fact, all the servitude of Catholicism is aggregated at Rome. There its yoke presses the most heavily. There we see what it makes of a people. There, too, Catholicism appears unveiled, just as it is. Elsewhere it disguises itself more or less, with a flexibility which is necessary in countries enjoying more or less freedom. At Rome the tyrant can hate liberty at his leisure, and especially in its most sacred manifestation, the liberty of conscience. There, also, the Pharisees in religion buy and sell in the temple, trafficking in holy things, in order that they may obtain in exchange honours, gold, and that temporal power which is to them the one thing needful. Luther's impression of Rome is well known. Lamennais went to the city in 1832, a credulous and humble pilgrim. He left it, his soul filled with indignation, shaking off against it the dust of his feet, and crying, 'At Rome they traffic in sacred things. If it were in their power they would sell the Father; they would sell the Son; they would sell the Holy Ghost.' And it is not surprising that Father Hyacinthe returned from Rome more detached than ever, not from Catholicism, but from Ultramontanism and from Jesuitism, which find on the scorched and sterile soil of the city of ruins their most congenial abode."

Our readers are already aware of the letter which he received from the General of the Carmelites, written evidently under the influence of the Vatican and at its dictation, requiring him not to appear in promiscuous assemblies, as he had done at the Peace League, and to give his preaching a new turn, so as no longer to favour that liberal Catholicism which he so heartily embraces. This would have been to deny his dearest convictions, and he was not the man to do it. The result is known to all the world.

Dr. Pressensé thus describes the man who has so effectively lifted up his voice on behalf of liberty of faith:

"Father Hyacinthe is of the ordinary stature and of a good form. His eyes sparkle with the scintillations of thought. The outlines of his mouth indicate invincible firmness. His manners are perfectly simple, having nothing either of that conventional softness or austerity which is often found in priests—a kind of clerical stamp, an indelible seal of the sacerdotal rank. You see in him a man and a Christian, never the representative of a class. Notwithstanding he went barefooted, wrapped in his monkish cowl, and having only a friar's cap upon his head, it was easy to see that he was a stranger to nothing that belongs to human nature, and, I will add, to the usages of modern society."

The Unitarian Herald.

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 10, 1869.

A WORD FOR OURSELVES.

WE say a good many words for others in the course of the year, helping on, with such influence as we possess, the best of the objects which come before our readers, and we see no reason why we should not say a few words for ourselves.

As our readers must be aware, the Herald was not started with any view to pecuniary profit, but solely because it was believed that the state of our churches rendered some such cheap means of communicating information, &c., necessary. The circulation which it has obtained, far larger than any similar publication has had amongst us, sufficiently proves that that belief was well founded; and the testimonies which we have received from men whose opinion is well worth having, not only within our own borders, but beyond them, encourage us to believe that our work has not been of a kind of which we have any reason to feel ashamed. Although the amount of time and thought and labour which we give week by week to the preparation of the paper might fairly call for remuneration, what we most anxiously desire is that it should be made still more extensively useful, and more successfully serve the purposes for which it was established.

Publishing the Herald at a price which brings it within the reach of all, we feel that we may fairly ask for a copy to be taken by every member of our congregations. This need not interfere with the circulation of other periodicals. Our monthly contemporaries occupy a different ground, while those who take our big five-penny brother, The Inquirer, will hardly feel the modest penny which taking the Herald in addition involves. But, large as its circulation has been, it is actually not taken in anything like half the homes connected with our various churches; and this not so much from any disinclination as from the slight trouble involved in procuring it regularly, and in many cases from ignorance of its existence. We have great difficulties to contend with in the local arrangements for its circulation, owing to the fact that our low price makes it hardly worth while for newsagents to take the trouble of procuring and sending it out for the number of subscribers that can be obtained in each separate locality. Moreover, there are many new members of our denomination who are hardly aware of its existence, and have never been asked to subscribe for it. Now, it is impossible for us to remedy this ourselves. It can only be done by those, in each locality, who feel that it is a good work that we try to do, and who are willing to help us in making it at once more widely useful and entirely self-supporting. To such friends we would say—the best help you can render us is by getting more copies of the paper taken. Some of our subscribers have taken extra copies for distribution, and we are glad to be helped in this way, but what we are most anxious for, is, to have our regular circulation extended, and we venture especially to ask our readers to try if they cannot each procure a new subscriber or two, to begin with the ensuing year.

Another way, hardly less important, in which our friends may help us is by making a more liberal use of our advertising columns. With regard to advertisements inserted for a direct pecuniary object, there is no need for us to say anything, as the large amount of money which has been raised in answer to really deserving appeals through our columns speaks for itself without any solicitation of ours. But there are a number of announcements connected with our congregational wants and doings which may not result in such palpable profit, and yet which, on a broader view, are well worth the small cost which their insertion as advertisements would involve. We allude especially to announcements of meetings, lectures, and special services. Our friends show that they regard these as widely interesting to our readers at large by the readiness with which they send us reports—often, indeed, in such embarrassing profusion as to necessitate our curtailing them in ways which some do not like. Now, we have reason to know that no part of the denominational intelligence which the Herald contains is so universally read as the advertisements of meetings, lectures, &c., on the first page, and it surely is not unreasonable to ask that our various congregations, apart from any consideration of whether it would be directly advantageous to themselves, should be willing to incur the slight expense of advertising, once, all their special gatherings and lectures, as their share in keeping up the intercommunity of feeling and interest which is produced far more by a common knowledge of the meetings and subjects which are about to engage the attention of our churches, than by any record of them afterwards.

It is three years since we made any appeal of this kind to our friends. During these three years the Herald has been more prosperous than ever before, but it is yet far from what it might be, and we ask our readers to do their best for us as we do ours for them.

AMERICAN NOTES.

A short time ago we published part of a letter from Bishop Payne, who is at the head of Wilberforce University, which belongs to the African Methodist Church, warmly thanking the American Unitarian Association for the aid it had rendered in procuring the services of lecturers from Antioch College. The editor of the Monthly Journal of the Association, who has lately paid a visit to the university, says it is sad to know that "certain leaders in the Congregational and Methodist denominations are trying to excite prejudice because of this aid—unable to comprehend either how the African Methodists could accept aid from us without compromising their position, or how we could render it without some concealed sectarian design." He adds:

"Our visit to Wilberforce has made us more than ever satisfied that what we have done there has been well done, and it has made us hope that we may do more. The theory of the institution is this: Bishop Payne, who is the head and soul of it, believes that one very important method of elevating the coloured people of the South is by training a class of men and women of their own race, who shall go forth as missionaries among them. Moreover, he believes that the best way of training these missionaries is to take them away from the atmosphere of ignorant caste prejudice which exists in every Southern community, and the evils of which all our teachers at the South have learned to realise; and to keep them, during the four years of their preparation, under the influences of Northern society, and in contact with Northern ideas. And he believes in giving them, not merely narrow professional training, but the most liberal culture which the opportunities will allow."

Mr. Lowe mentions that one of the students, that conducted him over the building, who had just entered his second year, had his exercises that morning in Xenophon's Anabasis, Hebrew, grammar, and astronomy.

The Rev. Harry Jones gives us an amusing account of a visit which he paid while in Philadelphia to the Sunday-school Jubilee of the "Methodist Episcopal Church." This is the most numerous Protestant community in the United States, numbering about five times as many as the "Protestant Episcopal." President Grant is a member of it, and being then in the city, his presence was secured. Mr. Jones says:

"I took my place in the theatre, one among 4,000 or 5,000 who filled every corner and gallery of the building. A portion of the Sunday-school scholars from a number of chapels were seated on the stage. They comprised 1,100 girls, many of them grown young women, in white dresses, and the crowd of them reached as far back as the space behind the footlights could be cleared out to accommodate them. They entirely covered the floor of the stage, and as they mostly fanned themselves as they sat ready for the proceedings to begin, the sight, from the middle of the lower gallery, where I sat, was very striking. One of the stage boxes was reserved for the President, and the hum of conversation broke into clapping of hands and cheers when he appeared and took his seat, accompanied by Mrs. Grant and a party of friends.

"Bishop Simpson then stood facing the audience in front of the conductor's seat and offered a short, sensible prayer, and the proceedings, which consisted of songs and recitations by the scholars, some religious, some comic, commenced. The singing was not good; it lacked the fulness and the light and shade of similar school choruses in England. Part of it moreover was simply painful, at least to myself. On more than one occasion two scholars were brought forward to sing a duet. They were horribly frightened, poor girls, and made no more noise than two mice in a barn. Of course, their untrained voices could not fill the building. They were heard and seen, that was all; and some of the audience cheered good humouredly. But the sense of failure was somewhat effaced by about thirty infant scholars, who sang a song called the 'Jolly little Clacker.' These little tots had no sense of shyness, and did their very best, standing in a row behind the foot-lights, and clapping their hands in accompaniment to the refrain, which was—

Jolly little clacker, with your clack, clack, clack.'

Then they all bobbed a curtsy, and were trooped out by a teacher. The clacker is, I believe, an American bird.

"But the President was there, and the chance of dragging him into the performance was too great to be lost. He is very shy and reserved, but he is the President, and a member of the 'Methodist Episcopal Church,' so he had to gratify his friends.

"One of the songs, far on in the programme, was 'See the conquering hero,' &c. 'His they took out of its turn and compelled the President to assist in rendering effective. They led him out of his box and set him behind one of the scenes about one-third of the way down the stage. 'Here he stood looking very uncomfortable till the verse began—'See the godlike youth advancing.' Then he marched out to a chair in the middle, directly in front of the footlights, and sat down with a big nosegay in his hand, looking still more out of his element. After the song, the people insisted on a speech from him. He is a very wise man, and seldom speaks in public; but they were too much for him on this occasion. He therefore got up and made a few remarks, in a tone so low that some of the audience were rude enough to shout, 'Speak louder!' But he did not, choosing rather to shut his mouth and sit down. Then he was asked to walk towards the back of the stage, and either see or show himself to the scholars, the young ladies in white. This he did, but the temptation was too strong for the damsels, who presently made a rush upon him and kissed him by the dozen at a time. They kissed his ears, his eyes, his nose, and his beard. They devoured him, falling upon him in such force that presently I could see only the top of his head—he is very short—in a whirlpool of white muslin. The scene was so ludicrous that a general cackle of laughter rose from the whole audience, and the poor President swam out as fast as he could, leaving the theatre immediately afterwards."

A union has taken place between the Old School and New School Presbyterian Churches in the States. A jubilee meeting in honour of the event was held at Pittsburg, and the two Moderators clasped hands in recognition of the union. One of the first proposals made in the united Church was that a special thank-offering fund of a million dollars should be raised, but the Rev. Dr. John Hall moved that it should be 5,000,000 dollars. The increase proposed was cordially approved of, and other members said they were sure this amount would be raised.

LONDON AUXILIARY SUNDAY-SCHOOL ASSOCIATION.

At the meeting held on Wednesday evening, the 24th ult., of which we gave a report last week, the following was the Visitor's report:

"Gentlemen,—In visiting the schools this year I have unfortunately not had the advantage of my colleague's help. The demands of his own school have been too urgent to admit of his absence. All the schools, however, have been visited once, and three of them have been seen twice. It has been very gratifying to find that most of them present some feature of improvement—either the number of scholars is larger, the attendance more regular, the order better, the rooms cleaner and more tastefully kept, or there is more life in the school, and spirit amongst the teachers. There are some two or three, on the other hand, that have remained nearly stationary, one large school has considerably declined, and three others have been totally extinguished, for a short time only, it is to be hoped. I have tried to discover a cause for these untoward features in our past year's history (the symptoms of decline lying mainly in the southern and extreme eastern districts), but have only half satisfied myself on the point. There can be little doubt, I think, that lay-preaching is dividing with lay-teaching the efforts of some of our most active workers—as the labourers in each vineyard are few, and the work great, it is beginning to be discovered that neither health nor strength will long stand the strain of both these interests at once—the teachers of the day being often the preachers at night. Of course these observations do not apply to the closing of the Brixton school—that is a case suu generis, and will, in the committee's report, have explained itself. It will be a cruel irony of fate, however, if the great zeal of some of us for the spread of the Unitarian name, and the strong advocacy of others for denominational education, should result in the closing of those particular sections of our Sunday-schools.

"Not the least useful portion of the visitor's duty is to make known to one school the best approved plans of another, leaving, of course, the suggestions to go for what they are worth, and to be received or rejected at pleasure. Some schools readily receive a new idea, adopt it, and probably improve upon it; others are very conservative, and the particular plans that would most benefit them they are the last to see in a favourable light. I visited a school in the morning which commenced, very late, by singing a hymn; only a child here and there had a book, and if they all knew the hymn few sang it; immediately it was finished the children scuttled to their classes. The only class-book with more than one copy to a class seemed to be the Scriptures. Observing a teacher with a class of children, some of whom could read short words, whilst others could not tell one letter from another, I took the latter apart by themselves, but could not find a single elementary book to teach them A from B, but a stray number or two of the Chatterbox.

"Here it is evident the school wants method, not money nor teachers. It does not grow, and hangs by a very precarious thread of existence indeed, as everybody with the smallest amount of experience would expect. On the afternoon of that same day I visited another school which has only two very young teachers, one of them acting as superintendent. Here in a very poor room, and with slender means, the best seemed to be made of everything. There were about twenty children present, divided into three classes, an elder girl teaching the younger ones. Each child, however, had a book; the records of entry and attendance were accurately kept; and, if I mistake not, even home visiting was accomplished, by two of the youngest, but bravest and most spirited of our teachers. Whilst I am upon this subject let me say that there is another school in the south-eastern district, lying outside the range of all our ordinary school intercourse, that surprises me more and more every year by the spirit and energy manifested, under what ninety-nine people out of a hundred would consider the most depressing circumstances. The minister lives miles away during the week; none of the male part of the congregation lend the slightest aid; two superintendents and one teacher I have myself known break down at their posts; class-books are exceedingly scarce—and the sources from whence these might be replenished I imagine still scarcer—and yet I find that this school has been conducted throughout the year by two or three young ladies, all of them looking under twenty years of age, and yet at the time of my visit there were nearly sixty children present. In such a case as this it would be hopeless to expect that any roll or admission-books could be kept, or that any exact method of recording the attendance prevailed. It is a courageous struggle with difficulties every Sunday, and all the year round, and one can only pray that health and strength may be preserved to these most zealous teachers to enable them to continue their arduous but glorious work. As another instance of the very able management of a Sunday-school by ladies, I cannot refrain from here mentioning Hackney. It was with great pleasure I found this school in every way showing, as I thought, steady signs of improvement. There are two or three of our schools so poor that they cannot afford to buy new books, even when the old ones are worn out. Of course, none of the more recent publications of the parent society ever find their way into such schools, and a glance at the literature for the youngest children often shows that it consists mainly of an unsightly bundle of torn and dirty leaves. For children of the infant class standard a few large boards with simple lessons in short words of clear, bold type is the best medium of teaching; and that generally in a collective, rather than an individual way. Two of the best conducted infant classes are those at Portland-street and Chapel-street. It is nothing but a pleasure to stand by and see them taught. The secret of this success in a great measure probably is that the teachers of the weekday school teach them also on the Sunday. There are few things that help to steady a school more than a successfully managed infant class. Turning to the other end of our school system, I found two of the best conducted and the largest of our elder classes at Essex-street and Spicer-street. The former of these is taught by the superintendent himself, in a very superior way indeed; the result is that the youths stay on for years. I noticed some MS. books written with great care, and in a style of unusual neatness; the subjects consisted of short essays and sermons. On inquiry I found the class were in the habit, amongst other things, of writing out from memory as much of the substance and aim of Mr. Ham's sermons as they could remember when they got home. Formerly they used to take notes during the service, but this plan is now discarded. Curious to see what would be the result of their mental transcripts of the sermon I had the pleasure of hearing, I visited the school again on the following Sunday, and was well rewarded by seeing how accurately upon the whole they had caught the idea and spirit of the discourse. In this school as many of the scholars as chose take a short turn in the Temple Gardens before the service begins; only one or two teachers go with them. 'Do they all come back always?' 'Oh dear, yes,' was the reply, 'without fail.'

"The elder class of youths at Spicer-street is conducted by one of the former scholars, and it is very gratifying to find how well he keeps them together year after year.

"Desirous of seeing something more of orthodox schools than I was able to do last year, I went, in company of the same kind friend from Chapel-street, to visit the school attached to a chapel numbering a congregation of over one thousand five hundred people. At half-past nine, the time for commencing the school, there were but three scholars and as many teachers present. During the twenty minutes we stayed conversing with the superintendent about twenty or thirty more came in, and as we were leaving we met several others on the steps, teachers as well as scholars; but it was then striking ten o'clock. The numbers on the books of this school, we are told, were about two hundred and fifty.

"When we left this school we went to another in Bishopsgate-street. Here there was an attendance of about seventy or eighty out of a total of three hundred, and this we found was the usual morning average. The feature of this school that pleased us best was the elder scholars' class, consisting entirely of young men, presided over by a gentleman whose special aptitude for the work was strikingly apparent in all he said and did. It is the habit of the class to take it in turn to read a paper each Sunday morning. One had just been read on the Beatitudes, and the teacher was amplifying the text and commenting on the paper when we entered. He did this in a free, yet tender, tone of criticism, and showed a liberality of thought, with a wider reading and interpretation of Scripture than we have been accustomed to hear in schools other than our own. His evident piety and earnestness, mingled with his gentle and affectionate style of address, were clearly very effective with these young men. We did not wonder in the least when we were told that for years they had never had a teacher of the boys' school that had not passed through his class; indeed, all the teachers in the school but two, we were informed, were formerly scholars in it. In all but this first class the school was conducted on the simultaneous lesson plan of the Sunday School Union, viz., each class in each school doing the same lesson at the same time every Sunday throughout the year. The next Sunday morning we went to a large school attached to one of the most popular chapels in the south of London; it commenced as early as a quarter-past nine. In the afternoon they have had as many as nine hundred children present; the morning average is reckoned roughly at about half that of the afternoon. No roll-book is kept, nor any admission-book; the children are placed in a class the superintendent thinks best suited to them, and all responsibility for the scholar's welfare is placed in the teacher's hands; he is considered to be the pastor of his little flock. Every teacher is a member of the congregation; his fitness to teach is, therefore, considered to be in a measure guaranteed. There is not a class-book in the school but the Bible; armed with this, and choosing his own subject, he meets his class, be it of infants or youths, and with the single object in view, 'to bring them to Christ;' he reads, exhorts, expounds, and discourses on subjects having reference to their souls' salvation, and nothing else; they do not attempt to teach the children to read, it is assumed that they learn this elsewhere. You would suppose that this kind of teaching would soon exhaust both teacher and scholar, but it is not so. As we looked round the large room we could see class after class leaning forward with the greatest eagerness, listening to the teacher whose words seemed to hold his little audience spell-bound. We moved amongst them, and everywhere found the theme the same; it might be summed up in the words, 'There is a fountain filled with blood, that blood was shed for me.' We looked in last of all at the oldest class of boys—the chapter they were reading was 12th Exodus; as each boy read his verse he explained what he thought was its meaning. The 10th verse, which is as follows: 'And ye shall let nothing of it remain until the morning; and that which remaineth of it until the morning ye shall burn with fire,' was thus interpreted—'We are not to half-eat Christ, but to wholly eat him,' and was supplemented by the teacher's explaining the latter part of the verse, which the boy was unable to manage, as being 'the devouring fire of God's wrath against sin, which was thus utterly burnt up in Christ's sacrifice.' I asked him whether he considered this chapter as having actual reference to Jesus, and he said 'he did.' When we entered this large school there were not above seventy children present at the commencement; during the reading, singing, and prayer, the doors are locked. Crowds of children gathered meanwhile outside, and all the while the subsequent teaching was going on they continued to arrive. By half-past ten there were about three hundred present. Differ with the doctrines taught at this school as much as one may, it was impossible not to admire the intense earnestness and power that could enlist the attention of a number of children so completely for a whole hour at least. Last Sunday evening we went to the service which is held every Sunday specially for children, at the schoolrooms under Mr. Spurgeon's Tabernacle—'The Children's Church' it is called. There were between one hundred and eighty and one hundred and ninety boys and girls present. The service is conducted in exactly the same way as that for adults. One of the superintendents officiated, and two other teachers were present to keep order. It is an admirable idea, and is well worthy of our consideration. We were told they are being tried with great success in other places as well. In the afternoon there is a lady at this chapel, who meets a class of between two and three hundred young women every Sunday; it is not attempted in the morning.

"If from the experience I have given of the attendance at other schools the conclusion is arrived at that the morning schools in London are, and must be, a comparative failure, I beg most emphatically to differ from such conclusion. We give in to this idea much too readily. A glance at the returns of the Essex-street, Newington-green, Portland-street, and Clavence-road schools will show that the morning attendance is not very far behind that of the afternoon, and even among the Missions, Spicer-street appears to considerable advantage. The first of these schools I look upon as having almost solved the problems which have puzzled us so long, viz., how to bring up the morning averages, and how to retain the elder scholars. What is done here can be done in other places if as much strength, zeal, and ability can be thrown into the work. As has been said over and over again, there is no difficulty that besets this question of Sunday-school education that cannot be overcome, provided the congregations will make it their business to supply the schools with teachers in sufficient numbers, and of the right kind."

LEICESTER: FREE CHRISTIAN CHURCH.—On Sunday, December 5th, the anniversary sermons were preached—in the morning by the Rev. C. Clarke, of Birmingham, and in the evening by the Rev. C. C. Coe, of Leicester. Collections were made on behalf of the church funds, amounting to £12. 5s. 0d.

IMAGINATION.

BY ROBERT LEIGHTON.

WHEN Reason has built up on facts all clear
The highest truth its arguments can teach,
Imagination steps into a sphere
That Reason cannot reach.

And there it plucks high thoughts out of the mist,
And round them throws its sunshine—thoughts that need

No further proof, but unto those that wist
Are very truth indeed.

And thus it is that passing through the clouds
Where Reason halts, it brings from far above
Those mysteries the present time avoids,
And after days approve.

CHURCH CURIOSITIES.—XXIV.

A BLUNDER OR NOT?

In the Cardinal Vicar's invito sacro for the Council, the words "Roma immorale" were printed instead of "Roma immortale." As may be supposed, this has caused much merriment among Roman liberals, who say it is no mistake at all, but that for once the Cardinal Vicar had been moved by the spirit of truth.

A BEADLE'S IDEA OF CHANGE.

When Dr. Norman McLeod resigned his parish at Linlithgow, and removed to Glasgow, at the dinner after his induction he told the following anecdote: "I confess that I had hoped to have been permitted to live and die at Linlithgow. Indeed, my old beadle was very much of the same mind. When I first went to Linlithgow he took me into the graveyard, and, showing me the graves of my predecessors, said, 'There's where Dr. Bell lies, and there's where Dr. Dobie lies, and there's where you will lie if you are spared.' He was indignant with me when I accepted the call to Glasgow. 'Well,' he said, 'ye are the first minister that was ever lifted out of Linlithgow, except to the grave.' And I don't think he yet pardons me for having deprived him of that satisfaction."

A JURY ON INFANT BAPTISM.

The Western Baptist Review (American) says that early in the last century a Baptist by the name of Robert Calver, living in New Jersey, published an advertisement in a newspaper, offering twenty dollars reward to any that would produce a text to prove infant baptism. The Rev. Samuel Harker, a Pædobaptist, took him up, and carried a text to the advertiser; but Calver would not allow that infant baptism was in it, and Harker sued him. The case was tried with all due formality, and the jury found for the defendant. After that, Mr. Calver, in another advertisement, offered forty dollars for such a text; but being warned by the want of success on the part of Mr. Harker, none ventured an effort to obtain the premium.

This reminds us of what was done by good old John Mason, of York. After his conversion to Unitarianism, he had small handbills printed, offering a reward of Five Pounds to any one who would find for him the word Trinity in the Bible. These bills he distributed up and down, and it was said that many persons were disappointed in not being able, after long and painful search, to claim the reward.

AN AWEWARD BREAK.

The minister of a parish church gave out the hymn, "I love to steal awhile away." The chorister commenced singing, but, owing to some difficulty, in recollecting the tune, could get no farther than, "I love to steal," which he did three or four times successively, when the clergyman, in order to relieve him from the dilemma, humorously remarked that "it was very much to be regretted," and added, "Let us pray."

A CHRISTIAN IN SPIRIT OF PREACHING.

Bishop Bloomfield used to relate that, on one of his visits to Cambridge, seeing at the University Church a verger whom he remembered many years before when he was himself an undergraduate, congratulated him on his healthy appearance at so great an age. "Oh yes, my lord," the fellow said, "I have much to be grateful for. I have heard every sermon which has been preached in this church for fifty years, and, thank God, I am a Christian still."

AN EXTREME COMMENTATOR.

The Rev. James Oliphant, of Dumbarton, had a curious habit of making running comments, in a low tone of voice, as he read the Scriptures. Hence, as he never cured himself of the practice, those seats nearest the pulpits were the most highly prized. Here are two samples of his "pulpit notes": Reading of the swine running into the sea, he muttered, "Oh, that the devil had been choked too!" Reading Peter's remark, "We have left all and followed thee," the minister ejaculated, "Aye boastin', Peter, aye braggin'; what had ye to leave but an old crazy boat, and may be two or three rotten nets?"

PRIESTCRAFT OVERSHOOTING ITSELF.

Some months ago a woman, belonging to the little body of Protestants in Bologna, died, and the priest of the parish announced to his parishioners that by means of a dream he knew that she was in a sad state in the other world, and greatly in need of masses for her soul. He also said that certain doleful cries came to him at midnight from the house in which she died. On this some took alarm, the occupants left the house, and for a time it remained empty. But it turned out that the woman did not die in the house, but at the hospital; and this becoming known, the priest has been a good deal laughed at.

THE THREE CONSTITUENTS OF WOMAN.

S. BARING GOULD, in his "Curiosities of Olden Times," gives various uncomplimentary myths as to what woman was made of, closing with his own account of her composition: "Poor woman! it is pleasanter to believe that she is made from our ribs, which we know come very close to our hearts, and thus to account for the mutual sympathy of man and woman, and thereby to account for that compassion and tenderness that man feels for her, and also for the manner in which she flies to man's side as her true resting-place in peril and doubt. But we have a cosmogony of our own, elucidated from internal convictions, assisted by all the modern appliances of table-rapping and clairvoyancy. According to our cosmogony, woman is compounded of three articles, sugar, tincture of arnica, and soft soap. Sugar, because of the sweetness which is apparent in most women—alas! that in some it should have acidulated into strong domestic vinegar; arnica, because in woman is to be found that quality of healing and soothing after the bruises and wounds which afflict us men in the great battle of life; and soft soap, for reasons too obvious to need specification."

MANCHESTER: FAREWELL PARTIES TO THE REV. JAMES DRUMMOND, B.A.

ON Friday evening last, the Cross-street congregation held a party at the Memorial Hall to say farewell to the Rev. James Drummond on his leaving Manchester to undertake the chair of Theology in Manchester New College, London. About 200 persons were present, including many neighbouring ministers and a few friends from other congregations, present by invitation. Among those present were the Revs. Dr. Beard, W. Gaskell, T. E. Poynting, W. H. Herford, G. H. Wells, J. Wright, B. Herford, H. E. Dowson, J. T. Whitehead, J. Worthington, J. Harrop, W. G. Cadman, Jos. Freeston, and B. Walker; and Messrs. W. R. Wood, I. Mackie, H. J. Leppoc, R. M. Shipman, W. Hirst, R. D. Darbshire, David Gordon, J. Armstrong, H. Rawson, J. Walkden, P. Allen, J. Peacock, J. Hadfield, G. J. Taylor, J. Barrow, E. C. Harding, P. Eckersley, P. Eckersley, jun., C. H. Blackley, B. Templar, S. Barton Worthington, T. Worthington, Dr. Marcus.

Tea was served in the large hall, which was beautifully decorated with pictures, &c., and the meeting assumed, during its earlier part, the character of a conversazione. At a quarter to nine, however, WILLIAM RAYNER WOOD, Esq., was called to the chair, to preside over the more formal business of presenting to Mr. Drummond a beautiful parting gift of a timepiece, together with a cheque for £240.

As the meeting had been understood to be of a private character, no reporting arrangements had been made; but by the kindness of a friend we are enabled to give our readers the speech of the Rev. James Drummond, which was of more than private interest.

After addresses from the CHAIRMAN, Mr. R. D. DARBISHIRE (who was called upon to make the presentation), and the Rev. W. GASKELL, all dwelling upon the regret with which they parted from Mr. Drummond, and wishing him God speed in his new sphere,

The Rev. JAMES DRUMMOND, who was received with warm applause, rose to reply. After acknowledging, on the part of Mrs. Drummond and himself, their strong appreciation of the kindness they had received during their ten years' connection with the congregation, he said he had not only to leave a large circle of kind and dear friends; he had also to leave, to some extent, a profession which he had thought he never could leave. Then, there was also the strong attachment which grew up in a minister's mind to the place where he had laboured. Looking around he missed many faces whose kind smiles welcomed him when first he came to Manchester, and who had passed away to their long rest. But he saw many new faces who had come to the chapel whilst he had been there, and many more were growing up; and he felt that a congregation had a continuous life which never came to an end so long as men had hearts to worship, and there was philanthropic work to be engaged in. He would also have to separate himself from a kind, considerate, and valued colleague, his intercourse with whom had been one of unvarying pleasure; and no small part of the pain he felt in going away was lest his leaving might cause any pain or anxiety to him.

He did not know that he need allude to any efforts he had made whilst there. What he had had to say he had tried to speak in a simple candid manner; but he was not much given to criticise the efforts of others, and would not, therefore, begin to criticise his own. With regard to the future, they lived in a time which, to them, constituted as their congregation was, must be of great interest, and he should always rejoice to hear it was successful in the highest sense—that its members were carrying forward the glorious work inaugurated by an older generation, and that the cause of religious freedom and fidelity of worship prospered in their hands. "We are proud of our freedom. We live in times when freedom is making great strides. Many men, in no way connected with our churches, are coming to believe that the various forms of religious belief may change and may change not only with no detriment to their religious life, but with benefit to it; and it is for us, if we can, to stretch out our hands to these men, and show by our own experience that it is possible to reconcile the demands of true religion and loyal worship with perfect intellectual freedom and the greatest liberty of conscience. But in order to do this we must pay chief attention to the religious life. There are some to whom freedom seems most advantageous in enabling them to throw off old errors. But this is in the deepest reality not advance; it is simply retracing a wrong path. Our advance is made when we grasp the highest principles and noblest truths, and when in our own individual lives we apply those principles to their highest use. I hope and believe that this congregation will have the honourable distinction of applying to its own life, as well as to the lives of its members, all that is noblest in the religious activity of the present day, and of combining this with a just respect for its principles of freedom, and it will have a great work to do in this large town. We know not at all what the future shape of the religious life of England is to be. That it is not to be what it is now is every day more apparent, but of one thing I am persuaded, it must grow out of what we are at present. And it was this which led me to accept the work which is taking me to London. It has been thought, if I may trust the expressions of others, that I have some qualifications which may interest others of the rising generation of ministers, and that while labouring in such a sphere I might have a wider influence than that over any particular congregation. Our college, I believe, is the only theological college in this kingdom which is based on principles of entire religious freedom. Its professors are chosen for their qualifications of character and intellect, and its students are fettered by no articles while they pursue their studies. And it has seemed to me not impossible that, resting on such a basis, our college might in time extend its sphere, because I believe that men in other churches will gradually come to appreciate its position, and that we may possibly gather in a few of the freest minds from this wider circle; and I have no doubt that you will sympathise with me in any efforts I may be able to make in this direction. And now may I express one most earnest wish, that you may soon meet with one for a successor who may, I will not say, cause you to forget me—(no, no)—but not to miss me—one who will address himself to your religious feelings, and in some way lift up your hearts and thoughts higher than I have done. And do you on your side let the minister of your choice feel he has your true sympathy. The work of the ministry is a work in which, more than any other, a large amount of help may be given in various ways by the members of the congregation. I have no doubt that a large part of the true success of any minister must arise from his having a conviction that there is a real sympathy between himself and his hearers; and that when he is uttering to them the thoughts which to himself must possess an absorbing interest, those thoughts are finding a response in the breasts of very many. It has been my happiness with regard to many of you to have that conviction; and though I cannot hope to have done one hundredth part of the work which I have desired, yet still I gratefully accept these gifts as expressions of your sympathy, and still more the kind words of sincere feeling which you have addressed to me this evening. (Loud applause.)

After a vote of thanks to the chairman and to Mr. E. C. Harding, to whose exertions it was said the success of the meeting had been largely owing, the meeting closed with the singing of the hymn, "For ever with the Lord."

On Saturday evening, upwards of 100 of the teachers, scholars, and members of the Congregational Society of the Lower Mosley-street School took tea together, and afterwards a meeting was held in the boys' schoolroom, over which Mr. GEORGE SMITH presided, for the purpose of saying farewell to the Rev. James Drummond, B.A., who as one of the ministers of Cross-street Chapel had taken great interest in the Sunday-schools and the Congregational Society, and also of presenting to Mr. Drummond an address from the teachers and Congregational Society, which consists of elder scholars and teachers, and an album containing the photographs of many familiar faces at the schools. The presentation was made by Dr. Marcus, and warmly acknowledged by Mr. Drummond.

The meeting was subsequently addressed by the Rev. W. H. Herford, Messrs. R. D. Darbshire, C. J. Herford, and John Chadwick, and was closed with the benediction.

LEEDS: HOLBECK DOMESTIC MISSION.

THE annual meeting of the Holbeck Domestic Mission was held on Monday evening in the Congregational Hall connected with the Mill-hill Chapel, Leeds. Mr. Councillor MATHEWS presided, and there was a large attendance.

The report was presented by the Rev. E. WILKINSON.

The past year had again been one of extreme difficulty and severe trial to almost every class, employers and employed having had to contend with circumstances no less critical than harassing. In addition to the poverty dependent upon bad trade during the early months in the year, there had been an unusual amount of sickness in the district, and it had been the object of the missionary to carry the Gospel into the homes of the poor in the face of the trials and difficulties of life.

He then went on to speak of his labours as being divided into domestic visitation and the duties attendant on the various institutions having the mission as a centre. He also spoke of the social and moral life that he met with in his rounds. In summing up the results of his experience and operations during the year, he was again compelled to acknowledge that there was much to depress and sadden the heart, as well as a great deal to cheer and stimulate. First and foremost, he placed drunkenness as the cause of poverty and crime, which made every Englishman burn with shame as he looked upon the statistics thereof, and as demanding some decided action on the part of Christians and philanthropists if we were to maintain our position among the nations of the earth with dignity and honour, for the more he knew of the social life of the lower classes of society, the deeper did he see them sunk as slaves to our drinking customs. The multitude of agencies for the social, moral, and religious elevation of the people in the district had been actively at work throughout the year, and their efforts had been attended with marked success.

Mr. JOSEPH LUFTON proposed, and Mr. GEORGE BUCKTON seconded, the adoption of the report.

The CHAIRMAN gave a sketch of the history of the mission, and dwelt with satisfaction on the progress of the work during the past year, especially mentioning the steps that had been taken with the view of solving the problem of how to keep their elder scholars.

The Rev. J. E. CARPENTER, M.A., proposed a resolution heartily acknowledging the success which had attended the labours of the Rev. E. Wilkinson, and expressing sympathy with him in his endeavours to promote the moral welfare of the inhabitants of Holbeck. In speaking of the social life around us he remarked that in this town, as in other large places, the tendency was that every year the people became more and more widely separated, from the fact that a large smoky town was not considered a desirable residence. The consequences were extremely disastrous, and one portion of the community lived in almost complete ignorance of what the rest were doing. Such meetings as that, and such reports as they had that evening had presented, appeared to him to be most important, because they might be considered to bring them into actual contact with the life that was around them. He spoke of the two modes of attempting to secure the improvement of the people—the mechanical mode, by social reforms, the power from without; and the spiritual mode, the power from within—and concluded by asking the audience to express their sympathy with Mr. Wilkinson, not only in words but by deeds.

The resolution was seconded by Dr. GREENHOW, who looked to increased good being accomplished by Sunday-schools when the new system of national education came into operation.

Mr. DARTON LUFTON supported the resolution in a speech, in which he attributed much of the fever which was spreading in the town to the greatest possible carelessness, and even perverseness, on the part of the people themselves, with regard to some of the simplest sanitary precautions.

The resolution having been also supported by the Rev. T. R. ELLIOTT (Hunslet) and Mr. Councillor GAUNT, it, like the rest proposed during the evening, was agreed to unanimously.

The Rev. E. WILKINSON acknowledged the vote of sympathy, after which, on the motion of Mr. SCOTT, seconded by Mr. MORTON, the members of the committee for the ensuing year were elected.

WESTERN UNITARIAN CHRISTIAN UNION.

THE half-yearly meeting of this society was held on Tuesday last at Yeovil, but the attendance, owing to various fortuitous causes, was unusually limited. Amongst the visitors were J. Worsley, Esq., treasurer (Bristol), the Revs. W. J. Odgers (Bath), J. E. Odgers, M.A. (Bridgwater), R. L. Carpenter, B.A. (Bridport), P. H. Wickstead, B.A. (Taunton), J. B. Lloyd (Wareham), W. Robinson (Crewkerne), Messrs. W. F. Cuff (Moorlands, Merriott), T. Colfox (Bridport), W. Colfox (Bridport), T. Ralls (Bridport), Higgins (Colyton), &c.

An opening service, commencing at twelve o'clock, was held in the chapel, Vicarage-street, conducted by Rev. W. Robinson, the Rev. P. H. Wicksteed preaching from Zachariah viii. 16.

After the service the visitors and friends had lunch together at the Choughs Hotel, Mr. Cuff presiding, when various toasts were proposed.

Mr. J. WORSLEY, of Bristol, read the report, in the unavoidable absence of the secretary, the Rev. W. James. He remarked, in the outset, that Mr. James was the father and founder of this society, and that no one, excepting those associated with him in the committee, could form any idea of the time and labour he had expended. The Unitarians of the West, and, indeed, of the whole country, were greatly indebted to him.

The report stated that five congregations were now receiving aid, viz., those of Yeovil, Crewkerne, Marshfield, Topsham, and Cirencester; and local reports, favourable in each case, except that of Marshfield (near Bristol), were submitted. At Yeovil, some progress had been made under the ministrations of the Rev. W. Matthews, who had consented to remain at his post for another year. The Crewkerne congregation maintained the same numerical strength as at the date of the last report, but, in the interim, the minister in charge, the Rev. W. Robinson had been called upon to do battle against the Vicar of the parish in defence of Unitarian truth. More than 500 tracts had also been distributed. The Rev. H. Austin, of Cirencester (late of Warminster), had met with considerable success in his sphere of operations; and something had also been done at Topsham (Devonshire). With reference to the condition of the various churches embraced by the Union, no alteration had taken place since the date of the last report.

A financial statement was also submitted, from which it appeared that the income of the society for the past year amounted to the sum of £168 4s. 11d.; and that, after making the usual disbursements, including £82 for salaries, there remained on hand a balance of £61 16s. 1d.

Various business resolutions were then passed, adopting the report, appointing the committee, &c.

In responding to a vote of thanks, Mr. WORSLEY said he hoped to live to see the day when the cause in Yeovil would be in as flourishing a state as it was when he first knew it, nearly fifty years ago, his family being then settled in the locality. There were several sources of encouragement to be taken into account; and he earnestly advised the congregation to stick fast to their present minister.

The friends present afterwards had tea together, and the meetings concluded with an evening service in the chapel, when the Rev. W. J. OGDERS preached on the bad effects arising from false and unscriptural views of God.

SHEFFIELD: UPPERTHORPE CHAPEL.

OUR Sheffield friends had a very interesting service and meeting last Wednesday to inaugurate the ministry of the Rev. G. Knight, who, after being for some time the pastor of a General Baptist congregation, has, in consequence of a change of views, sought and found a place in the ministry of our churches. The Upperthorpe congregation has for some years had very discouraging circumstances to contend with, but the workers there have held together with singular heartiness and fidelity, aided by their friends of the parent congregation at Upper Chapel. On the occurrence of the last vacancy in the pulpit, a few energetic laymen, with Mr. Charles Woolen at their head, undertook the services, with what ministerial help they might obtain in the immediate neighbourhood, until a minister should be found who would be likely to carry on the work thoroughly well; and with occasional assistance most kindly rendered by Rev. J. L. Short, Mr. Blazeby, B.A. (Rotherham), and Henry Hill (Stannington), they have done so with acceptance, and marked success, the congregation having improved both in spirit and in numbers. The good which they have done was very evident in the unitedness and heartiness of the welcome which was given to the minister of their choice on Wednesday last. A good congregation assembled in the beautiful chapel at half-past three in the afternoon, for the Recognition Service, including many friends from Upper Chapel, and from Rotherham and Stannington. The Revs. G. Knight, J. Lettis Short, Henry Hill, David Maginnis (Stourbridge), W. Blazeby and Brooke Herford took part in the proceedings, Mr. Short giving the charge to the minister, and Mr. Maginnis, by whom we understand Mr. Knight was introduced into our ministry, giving the charge to the congregation. A very deep and fervent feeling characterised the service throughout, and Mr. Knight's address in accepting the "welcome" (given by Rev. W. Blazeby) was simple and manly, and gave the impression of genuine ability and earnestness. After the service the congregation, joined by other friends, assembled for tea in the large school-room, which was afterwards crowded by as hearty and enthusiastic a meeting as we ever attended. The chair was taken by John Hobson, Esq., one of the trustees, and one of the warmest friends and supporters of the congregation from the time of its first starting, now eleven years ago, in the little "St. Philip's preaching room," and addresses were given by the ministers already named, Messrs. Woolen, Alfred Osborne, Stockton, and others also taking part. Altogether it was such a welcoming day as augurs well for our new friend's ministry, and for the future of the Upperthorpe congregation.

INTELLIGENCE.

CHATHAM.—In June last the congregation here, in losing Mr. William Smith, of Camden House, a man who had made himself generally respected, both by his public and his private life, lost one of its oldest and staunchest friends. For very many years he had been a liberal supporter of what he held to be the cause of truth, and now that he is no more, he has left behind him a testimony of his desire to promote its interests, which for years to come will serve to remind those who knew him of his generous kind-heartedness and his love for his religion. By his will he directed his executors to pay to the treasurer of the congregation with which he was so long connected the sum of £800, to be invested, and the annual income arising from it to form a part of the congregational fund. This sum has accordingly been paid over to Mr. John Tribe, the treasurer; and we can only hope that this addition to their means will excite our friends at Chatham to still greater efforts for the promotion of the pure and simple faith which Mr. Smith was anxious to extend.

MANCHESTER: MEMORIAL HALL.—THE ECUMENICAL COUNCIL.—The first of two lectures on this subject was delivered by the Rev. Dr. Beard in the Memorial Hall on Wednesday evening last. We are unable to give even an outline of this very interesting and valuable contribution to the information of the public on one of the most important questions of the day. We regret that, owing, as we cannot but think, mainly to insufficient notice, the audience was but limited in numbers. Our readers will do well to avail themselves of the opportunity of attending the second lecture, when an epitome of the first will also be given; and we trust the attendance will be very much larger—more worthy at once of the learning and ability of the lecturer and of the exceedingly important subject, which, at no little cost of time and labour, he voluntarily brings before the public.

MANCHESTER: ROCHDALE-ROAD MISSION TO THE POOR.—On Tuesday evening last the Rev. S. A. Steinthal addressed a meeting of reclaimed drunkards, some of whom also addressed the meeting. The Rev. B. Walker presided. It is worthy of notice that several of these men are co-workers with the minister in the temperance work around the mission.

NEW SCHOOL, GODALMING.

To the Editors.—Will you allow me to call the attention of your readers to an advertisement which appears in your columns soliciting subscriptions for building a new schoolroom at Meadrow, Godalming. The population in the neighbourhood of the chapel has very largely increased during the past few years, and we are now constantly receiving applications for admission into the school which, from want of room, we are compelled to refuse. It is also felt that our small chapel is not only unsuitable, but inadequate for week-evening lectures, classes, and readings, all of which are greatly needed to enable us to keep pace with the increase of population, and to meet the demands which the neighbourhood makes upon us. The members of the congregation, although few, have very freely contributed towards the building fund, and have not appealed for help until their own resources were exhausted. They now ask the Unitarian public to help them in raising £100 which is required to enable them to open their new schoolroom free from debt, feeling sure that all who help will be contributing to the furtherance of our faith in a district where Unitarianism is at present but very little known. Hoping that a generous response will be given to this appeal, I am, yours respectfully,

W. A. CLARKE.

WHAT THE CHURCHES ARE DOING.

Polygamy in Natal is causing some trouble. It appears that the old Kafirs, having many cows, buy up all the wives, leaving the young men without any, and thereby causing much discontent. The Natal Legislature has, therefore, limited the price for a wife to twenty cows, established a registry, and fixed a marriage fee. The question is whether the old and rich men will not buy up more wives than ever.

The Swedish law which punished proselytism from the pure Lutheran Evangelical Church with fines has just been repealed. The only wonder is that it can have continued so long.

A keen and cutting attack on the Romish clergy, entitled "Qui êtes vous? Qui vous êtes," has just appeared in Paris, and is the subject of general talk. It is written by Alexandre Wéill, well known as a Hebrew scholar and a brilliant pamphleteer.

Everywhere Liberation principles seem making way. The Supreme Council of the State of Neuchâtel has proposed the following decree:—The relations between the State and the Church shall cease from the 1st of January, 1871. The revenues of ecclesiastical property shall be annually distributed by the State amongst the people of the churches or parishes to which the revenues belong. The houses to be appropriated as residences for the clergy as before; the church fabrics to be vested in the municipalities, who are to keep them in repair, and to place them gratuitously at the disposal of the various churches or religious societies existing in future for the purposes of worship. Priority in the choice of hours of service to belong to the majority.

An American missionary describes Mohammedanism in Constantinople as undermined by scepticism. The University at Constantinople, a Government institution, is prohibited from all religious instruction. The students are composed of Moslems, Christians, and Jews. Those of each faith are permitted to keep their own Sabbath. The professors are Frenchmen of the Rénan type. The prevailing tendency among the young educated Turks is to admire and adopt French manners. If Mohammedanism were not so thoroughly incorporated with the politics of the country, so that religious defection is regarded as treason, this tendency would reveal itself in a startling manner. Manifestations of fanatical hatred towards Christians are extremely rare. Among the common people a sincere spirit of toleration is rapidly developing into genuine good will. The same writer represents the Christian sects as very immoral. Said a candid Bulgarian merchant to him, "We cannot become Protestants, you are so strict; in this country we must lie and cheat to do business." The pompous ceremonies and the gaudy decorations of the churches, with their images and pictures, together with the corrupt practices of many even of the higher clergy, produce anything but a favourable impression of Christianity upon the minds of the Mohammedans, while the mutual distrust and enmity of the different sects is a perpetual scandal.

According to the Roman correspondent of the Pall Mall, the Pope, regardless of obstacles, clings to his resolution to procure from the Council the dogmatic enunciation of his infallibility, and has, indeed, so set his heart on this issue that his household believe he will not survive its rejection. There seems to be no doubt that the majority of the bishops will do whatever he wishes; but, on the other hand, the opposition is so powerful that Cardinal Antonelli a day or two ago urged him to defer the question, representing that the consequences of pressing it now might prove very serious. The Pope combated his arguments, and at last flew into a passion, exclaiming, "Hold your tongue. You are a diplomatist; you are not a theologian. Confine yourself to what you understand." Cardinal Antonelli is greatly exasperated, and has since avoided having an audience. Throughout the episcopal camp preparations are being made for battle. The Spanish bishops have had a conference with the bishops of South America, and it was unanimously resolved to support the dogma of infallibility. A section of the Italian bishops, convened by Cardinal Borromeo, and the Ultramontane French bishops, headed by Cardinal Bonnechose, have come to the same decision. These cliques will start a journal in their own language to uphold their principles during the sitting of the Council, and the Dominicans intend to publish a journal twice a month in support of the liberal party.

The number of buildings used in London every Sunday evening for theatre services now amounts to eleven, eight being engaged by the United Committee, of which the Earl of Shaftesbury is the chairman—viz., Astley's, Standard, Pavilion, Royal Amphitheatre, Sadler's Wells, Britannia, and the Metropolitan and Oxford Music Halls. The other buildings are St. James's Hall and the Effingham and Victoria Theatres.

In every religious body change seems to be going on. The Editor of the Jewish Record announces that he will receive the names of members of the Great Synagogue, who are in favour of a revision of the present ritual of the Hebrew Church, and would be willing to sign a requisition to the executive of that synagogue, requesting them to co-operate with the Rev. the Chief Rabbi, towards the accomplishment of their desire.

The Solicitor-General (Sir J. D. Coleridge) is to deliver an address at Sion College to the clergy of the archdeaconry of London on the 22nd of Jan., on "The freedom of opinion necessary in an Established Church in a free country."

The Rev. J. C. McCausland, rector of Clonmore, near Drogheda, some time ago published a pamphlet, entitled "The Hope of Israel." This came under the notice of Mr. Peabody, and in consideration of the "pleasure" which its perusal gave him, he has bequeathed to the author the sum of £2,000.

Two Nonconformists, Mr. Gardner, of Christ's, and Mr. West, of Trinity, are bracketed for the first place in the Moral Science Tripos, at Cambridge, adding another illustration to the number which have recently been given of the utter injustice of the present system by which Dissenters are excluded from the posts of honour and emolument at the Universities.

The difficulties in reconstructing the Irish Episcopal Church seem to be rather increasing than diminishing. The bishops appear determined not to relinquish the power which sitting and voting as a separate order would give them, and are very unwilling to grant the laity a preponderating number of votes in the General Synod. Dr. Tresham Gregg, the vowels of whose Christian name were so ingeniously transposed by Archbishop Whately, is for evading these difficulties, and has been trying to persuade his co-religionists, though apparently not with much success, that, if they attempt to relieve the Government of the task of reconstruction, they will commit the sin of Dathan and Korah!

According to the Weekly Register, the Bishop of London has lately refused to ordain two candidates for Anglican orders because they professed their belief in the Real Presence.

The Church of England seems always to be in trouble. Running back over the period to which our own memory extends, there was first the famous Tract No. 90 which threatened to split the Establishment in twain. Scarcely had the commotion this excited subsided when Henry of Exeter strove hard to expel the Evangelicals, but was beaten by Mr. Gorham, to his intense disgust, and in his wrath he excommunicated the Archbishop of Canterbury. Then came the Liddell and Denison prosecution, when the Evangelicals in turn tried to purge the Church of what they called semi-Popery, with what results recent teaching and practices sufficiently show. Peace had not been established before the dire "Essays and Reviews" threw both parties into a panic, and forthwith thousands of clergymen declared they could hold no fellowship with Rationalists, and both Houses of Convocation pronounced a solemn condemnation of the seven champions of un-Christendom, as they were called. Again an appeal was made unto Cæsar, but in vain; Dr. Rowland Williams and Mr. Wilson were confirmed in their benefices. Next came the Colenso fight, which was the hottest of all; but he proved himself more than a match for his opponents. And while High and Low were joining forces against him, the old foe re-appeared on the field, and Semi-Popery had to be met, and by shifts and evasions it has made good its ground. And now we have the attack on Mr. Voysey; and the question which many ask is, If Mr. Mackonochie may deal with the Articles and Rubrics at pleasure, why may not he? All these things, to our mind, serve to show that a statutory Church is not the best kind of Church for peace and concord.

The Times names the Bishops of London, St. David's, Worcester, and Ely as the prelates who will consecrate Dr. Temple, under a commission from the Primate, on Tuesday next. The bishop-elect still refuses to be drawn into a declaration of his theological views at the dictation of those who have no authority to question him. He seems to feel that if he sings A he may be called upon to sing B; and he wisely adheres to the line which he has fairly chosen as a member of a Church established by law. He will answer no questions which the law does not require him to answer. To do so would be creating a precedent which might be used to the disadvantage of other bishops in a similar position with himself.

WHAT IS SAYING ON CHURCH MATTERS.

Our readers may remember how anxious the Papal authorities were to get the liberal Cardinal d'Andrea into Rome, and that soon after his arrival there he died. His private secretary, in an article published in this month's Galaxy (American), does not scruple to affirm that he was murdered. At the time of his death there were whispers in Rome of poison; and the character which the Cardinal-Minister has obtained there would hardly free him from the suspicion of having recourse to this, if he considered it expedient. More details, however, than are given would be necessary to make the secretary's statement one to be relied upon.

The Athenæum informs us that medical literature has contributed a new term to the "Slang Dictionary." That peculiar swelling of the knee which used to be called the "housemaid's knee" is now known among surgeons as the "ritualistic knee."

In a pamphlet entitled, "Why I left the Church of England," the Rev. Edward Husband says:

"I am bound with thankfulness to acknowledge that it was Ritualism that led me to Rome. This experience is being confirmed daily by the numbers who are seeking admission into the fold. It is in this way that 'Ritualism' is doing good. In making men love the shadow, they soon yearn for the reality; thus paving the way for the goal of peace which lies before them."

What extraordinary things still pass current in evangelical circles is shown by an article in the Christian World, which, remarking on the Voysey prosecution, makes part of "the faith for which Christians of all churches contend" the idea, against which Mr. Voysey protests, of "Deity coming from heaven and dwelling in an individual man for some years, and then going away again."

The English Independent observes:

"It is delightful to see our brethren of the Establishment adopting the voluntary principle, and it is not to be wondered at if at first treading on their new ground they should make a few mistakes. It seems necessary to remind them that all the methods of working their new principle are not equally desirable. For instance, the mode which the rector and churchwardens of Holy Trinity, Gray's Inn Road, expend in the following circular, may certainly be described as objectionable:—'The rector and churchwardens having given their acquiescence to the kind offer of the gentlemen amateurs generally known as the "Black Diamonds of Louisiana" to give their favourite negro entertainment on behalf of the choir fund of Holy Trinity, Gray's Inn Road, may I ask your kind and generous support for the above object? Your obedient servant, W. W. G. WORTHINGTON. Tickets (stalls, &c.) may be had of me at the rectory and of the churchwardens.' We find it hard to put up with bazaars and raffles, and the 'Black Diamonds of Louisiana' would be quite too much for us."

The rector of Merthyr, Rev. J. Griffith, has just published a sermon, in which he says:

"Probably there is not, and never was, a set of men more lamentably deficient, as a body, in 'the great ordinance of preaching,' as Hooker calls it, than the clergy of the Church of England. Preaching is not so much thought of, may be, in England, but in Wales it is everything, and without it there is nothing. The Sunday sermon is the great topic of the week. It is the theme of every two or three gathered together. The collier at his dinner underground; the miner in the patch; the mariner on the schooner's deck; the fisherman in the watches of the night; and even the drunkard at the bar of the public-house. Welshmen everywhere take the sermon for their ordinary talk. Is it not folly then, of a most suicidal kind, to neglect an art which has obviously, even in a worldly point of view, to say nothing about saving souls, so many advantages to recommend it?"

The Tablet, in referring to "Anti-Council Meetings," somewhat unkindly says that "the Bishop of Orleans may reckon among his freethinking supporters the Anglo-Continental Society." Even an infallible Head does not seem an infallible specific for producing unity in a Church.

The Record learns, on authority which it cannot doubt, that the Bishop of Lincoln will not stand alone among the bishops in making protest against the consecration of Dr. Temple, on Dec. 21. Our contemporary also understands that bishops who may not feel it incumbent on them to protest against the consecration, have declined to take any part in it. Well, the general thought will be, they don't know when they have a good thing—that's all.

In a long and able speech at Yarmouth, Mr. Neville Goodman, M.A. (who is one of those that, having qualified themselves in all other respects for the emoluments of our two great national Universities, are excluded because they cannot conscientiously say they are members of the Church of England), pointed out the injustice of this in a very clear and forcible manner. He said that "He, and those who were similarly situated, could not enter the Senate, could not be on the roll of the electors who choose the Council of the Senate, could not vote for their representatives in Parliament; they could not become professors in art, literature, or science, although there was not much in these departments to require that they should be lashed with the Thirty-nine Articles. They were excluded, not by the will of the founders of the colleges, but chiefly by the Act of Uniformity passed some two hundred years ago."

After mentioning that these institutions were very rich, possessing between them an income of something like three-quarters of a million sterling, and showing that, as probably nine-tenths of this was expended in awarding prizes to those who distinguished themselves, admitting Nonconformists to instruction only was admitting them to comparatively little, he went on to observe:

"If in the regatta it were provided that no competitor should win a prize unless he believed in the transmigration of souls, they would not be surprised if some very indifferent oarsmen sometimes got prizes. He ought to say there was one thing besides the instruction—Dissenters were permitted to put two letters at the end of their names. That concession was made eleven years ago, and the result was that whereas there was then only one Nonconformist at Cambridge, there were now about thirty. He was happy to say that these gentlemen had not disgraced Nonconformity. There had been three Nonconformist senior wranglers, Mr. Aldis, Mr. Sterling, and Mr. Hartog, but unfortunately some had gone over from their own faith and form of worship to another because of these tests, and that was to his mind a worse evil than the exclusion of the others. The senior wrangler, when his name was read out, heard that he has achieved ease and fortune, social position, leisure to recruit his exhausted strength, a competence to enable him to pursue his own course, the means of entering any of the liberal professions. All these were his, provided he could declare himself bona fide a member of the Church of England. But if not, he felt that though he had done more than command success, he had only deserved it. They recently heard that the senior wrangler of last year had been made a common clerk in the Treasury, no doubt because the Government wished in some degree to redress the injustice of the University. That man might have discovered another planet; might have given us another great generalisation like Sir Isaac Newton—he might have told us the chemistry of the sun—he might have pursued his investigations on the subject of light, as Professor Stokes had done; but from all this he was debarred unless he would tell a lie."

It has been supposed that Latin, being the official tongue, would be the one used at the Roman Council, and that it must be familiar to the lowest and most incapable members of it. But the Pall Mall says:

"At a little rehearsal held the other day they came to signal grief at once. It was not a question of entering into a complicated debate about any dogmatical mystery, but simply of concocting the address to his Holiness in answer—more parlamento—to his speech from the Chair. And it was found that all the Latin available did not suffice for a common conversation. Cardinal Albieri, in whose rooms the scene took place, was beside himself. There was such a babel as had never been heard in or out of Genesis. At last a few American bishops proposed to substitute French, as a language in which a few present might understand each other. Things went on smoothly for a few minutes in the tongue of the Galileans, when uprose the Bishop of Reggio and loudly protested against the profanation. Matters of the Church could only be treated in Latin, he said, the Vulgate (which he evidently considered the original 'Revelation') being written in that holy tongue, and some one even suggested Christ and the Apostles as having spoken that tongue, no doubt, sarcastically. And so the Latin debate was resumed by the few who had mastered the language to a speakable degree. The others sat in silence, but when it came to signing the address they did sign it all like men. This meeting may well be taken as a prototype of the whole Council."

According to the correspondent of the Times at Rome, the Episcopal flock assembled there are anything but a happy family. He even goes so far as to "affirm that, behind the screen of Christian decorum and harmony which has been exhibited before the inexperienced eyes of trustful strangers, there has been going on in the last week as much active intrigue, counter moves, and cunning device as would gratify the soul of the craftiest electioneering agent." The story set afloat that the Pope had no idea of having the dogma proclaimed of his personal infallibility, but that if it comes before the Council it will do so only as a question spontaneously mooted by the members, "is but an instance of the deliberate falsehood so freely dealt in here with admirable uncton." "It is a fact, which only those who have no hesitation about lying till they are black in the face would attempt to deny, that the intention to get the present Council to proclaim dogmatically the Pope's personal infallibility has not merely been entertained, but that a most elaborate plot has been hatched to smuggle through the promulgation." By a bull for the regulation of proceedings, the Pope arrogates to himself the appointment of the Commission that is to have the power of receiving or rejecting, subject to his supreme approval, the questions which the Fathers may wish to lay before the Council. This reduces it to a mere machine, dependent for motion on the Papal main-spring. The president of the Commission is Cardinal Patrizi, "type of crass bigotry;" and the other principal members are Cardinal Antonelli, whose only care is to keep things smooth, the Archbishop of Malines and Dr. Manning, two of the most ardent of infallibilists; and the Bishop of Paderborn, who is described as "the one German bishop who is the sworn slave of the Jesuits."

A sketch of the life of Dr. Henry Cooke, of Belfast, in Sunday at Home, has chanced to fall under our notice, in which, after a description of Dr. Montgomery, the following passage occurs:—"It was by this 'lion of Arianism' that Henry Cooke, the minister of Killyleagh, was confronted. He survived his antagonist by several years, but Dr. Montgomery lived long enough to see and deplore the sad results of that system which he had upheld and defended." This statement is altogether at variance with the impression which we received from Dr. Montgomery in his last visit to this country, and we believe it to be only one of those loose assertions in which orthodoxy is so ready to indulge when referring to those whom it regards as heretics.

NOT PAUL BUT JESUS.

We have always considered Professor Newman's estimate of St. Paul an exaggerated one, and his elevation of Paul above Christ as the principal defect of his system, attributable, doubtless, to a reaction from orthodox deification. We observe that M. Renan in his recent work on St. Paul ranks him not only below the Saviour, but below S. Francis of Assisi and the author of the Imitation of Christ. "The writings of Paul," he says, "have been a dangerous stumbling-block, the cause of the principal defects of Christian theology. Paul is the father of the subtle Augustine, of the barren Aquinas, of the sombre Calvinists, of the bitter Jansenists, of the ferocious theology which damns and predestines to damnation. Jesus is the father of all who seek rest for their souls in dreams of the Ideal. It is that little which we know of the teachings and person of Jesus that gives life to Christianity."

In a recent article in the Siècle, M. Taxile Delord criticises M. Renan's view in the following words: "Poetical mysticism may satisfy M. Renan, but men seek from religion something else than poetry; they seek from it the solution of the moral problems that weigh upon their minds. This is the sole object of theology: and religious solutions of philosophical problems are dogmas. To create dogmas is to create a religion. Paul by being one of Christianity's most acute theologians became one of its chief founders. Had Christianity stopped short at the Gospels it would have been a poetry and not a religion. It is not for the inspirations of a Sermon on the Mount that the Pope is now summoning a Council. The threatened church is trying to strengthen itself by proclaiming new dogmas. By dogma has it conquered the world; by dogma does it hope to preserve its conquests."

We agree neither with M. Renan nor with his critic. On the one hand, the teachings of Jesus are not the mere mysticism that the former writer deems them. On the other, the wondrous triumphs of Christianity are due, not to its dogmatical theology, but to that spirit of piety which underlies all systems of belief, and must survive them all.

CYRIL.

ORTHODOXY ON ITS OWN SHOWING.

WE commend to the attention of our readers, especially those who prefer the publications of orthodox societies to those which are published by their co-religionists, the following which we have cut from the British Workman of this month:

"NOW FIRE A SHOT IF YOU DARE!"

"We read in the papers lately how a man was saved from being shot. He had been condemned in a Spanish court, but being an American citizen, and also of English birth, the consuls of the two countries interposed, and declared that the Spanish authorities had no power to put him to death; and what did they do to secure his life? They wrapped him up in their flags; they covered him with the Stars and Stripes and the Union Jack, and defied the executioners. 'Now fire a shot if you dare; for if you do, you defy the nations represented by those flags, and you will bring the powers of these two great nations upon you.' There stood the man, and before him the soldiery, and though a shot might soon have ended his life, yet he was as invulnerable as though in coat of triple steel. Even so Jesus Christ has taken my poor guilty soul ever since I believed in him, and has wrapped around me the blood-red flag of his atoning sacrifice; and before God can destroy me or any other soul that is wrapped in the atonement, He must insult His Son and dishonour this sacrifice; and that He never will do, blessed be His name.—C. H. SPURGEON."

Accustomed as we have been to the extravagance of many of the utterances of this gentleman, we must confess that our first feeling on reading this, which appears to us to be rank blasphemy, was one of intense pain; our moral nature seemed to receive a shock, such as even the ravings of professed atheists could scarcely give. The idea of God our Father being afraid of His own creature struck us as inexpressibly dreadful; perhaps, however, if we could believe that God is the fiend that some people delight to picture Him, we could more readily accept the notion of His being ashamed in the presence of Christ. As we cannot do this, we must protest against this monstrous view, and express a hope that our friends who are so dreadfully "unsectarian" will see that it is better to aid the circulation of our own periodicals, even though they may not present such an "attractive" exterior as the journal from which we have taken the extract, and others ejusdem generis.

ARNOBIUS.

BY M. FRANÇOIS CORBIÈRE.

ARNOBIUS was an African writer whose defence of Christianity appeared about the end of the third century. He is an extreme specimen of the school who deny all intuitive connection between truth and the mind, and link them together only by a chain riveted from without. He adopts on behalf of the Gospel a most materialistic and degrading line of defence. He was a rhetorician at Sicca, in Numidia, and was converted by visions—a fact we can well believe, for his whole Apology reads like an evil dream. According to him, not only was there nothing good in paganism, but absolutely nothing good in mankind before the coming of Christ. Before that, God was incomprehensible, incommunicable; and the soul could have no communion with Him. True, a belief in the Divine was universal, but men could make no use of it. Had animals a language they would worship the Creator as well as men could do; there would be a mere mechanical echo. The brutes would show their natural superiority to man, and if they possessed human organs would certainly do more than he. Do not they always fulfil unerringly the objects of their existence, whilst man constantly blunders in every field of action? Truly men are useless to the world; nay more, dishonour it by their sins. Immortality has been conferred on mankind only by Christ.

Is not this madness? Can a Christian speak thus? Arnobius has so spoken, and I have impartially summed up his declarations. He has ranked mankind below the brutes, and fancied that by so doing he enhanced the merits of Christ. Yes, when he prefers animals to men, when he waves his scalpel over the human body in search of the soul with colder irony than the most materialistic anatomist, when he sees in human wanderings not progress but impotence, when he denounces our race with more bitterness than the hardest public prosecutor, his aim is this—to glorify the work of Christ, who has bestowed immortality on a creature nameless, futureless, and purposeless.

Such a theory is blasphemous. Never did the idea of assisting the Almighty lead a profaner hand to touch the sacred ark. What glory can Heaven gain from such a representation of the vileness of our race? The glory of Christianity can be so enhanced only by lessening the glory of the original creation. Arnobius saw this difficulty, and evades it by another absurdity. When he has described man as so miserable, he does not dare to attribute his creation to God, but suggests that he is the work of some lower Being.

Again, if there be no spontaneous tendency of man to truth, how did the work of Jesus produce its effect? Here the results of Arnobius' system again show themselves: it is not enough that man be dishonoured, the Gospel is degraded also. Christian faith must be based no longer on those gracious words which moved the multitudes on the Mount, on the shore, in the market places, in the synagogues; man, according to Arnobius, has been made with ears not to hear. He has only eyes to see: all must be effected by miracle. Jesus Christ worked wonders. Arnobius recounts with delight the miraculous narratives of the Gospels; amplifies them, and retouches them with oratorical colouring. But they do not suffice; he borrows the wildest legends of the Apocryphal Gospels. Let us repeat it—it was in a vision of night, and not in the experience of daily life, that Arnobius conceived this mutilated Christianity, which, denying the internal evidences of truth and retaining only the materialistic support of miracle, makes man a mere automaton, and the Saviour a mere thaumaturge. But the rash orator is soon forced to contradict himself. For when he is pressed with the prodigies to which paganism also pretends, he can appeal only to the personal character of Jesus as the mark by which his miracles are distinguished. Yet surely this is a formal contradiction of his previous position: for how can the character of Jesus be appreciated except by the human mind? And thus Arnobius, the bold lover of the marvellous, is driven at last to rely on a purely moral proof and on that internal witness which at first he so obstinately rejected.

He has no thorough-going disciples in our days; but we still hear theories which vilify mankind, dwell upon the corruption of our race and our radical incapacity for good, and seek thereby to increase proportionately the glory of God and His Christ. Were it needful I would advance the following conclusions:—Man is as fit for the Gospel when he feels amid his imperfection the strivings of his higher nature, as when a feeling of vileness oppresses him and forbids his rise. God is as worthy of adoration when the germ of good which he has planted in the soul resists the attacks of sin, as when every spark of divine life is supposed to have been extinguished in a Fall. Jesus is as worthy of our homage when his life-giving words awake our consciences, as when his work is deemed to be entirely external and miraculous.

Let me say a word, since it is unfortunately needed, against the materialistic conceptions which make miracle the essential proof of Christianity. They are self-contradictory; for, just as the believers in man's total depravity are obliged to admit that there is a point where the soul can be stirred, else would the Gospel have no effect on it, so the partisans of material miraculous evidence are forced to take the moral sense as the test to distinguish between the miracles they deem true and those they deem false (as those of Catholicism in our own day). Why then not adopt the moral sense as the primary proof, and subordinate other evidence to it?

Remember the duty of faithfulness: it is not enough to give yourself to the Gospel, you are also responsible for the wisdom of the way in which you serve it. Arnobius succeeded because he suited his age; he was a fit captain for the Church when she was sailing towards the Dead Sea of the Dark Ages. Times are changed. Tell the men of this age that individual reason is nothing and traditional faith is everything: they will look within, see the powers which Infinite Providence has given them, and answer you not a word. Tell them of miracles before everything: they will ask you to work one. But appeal to that inner consciousness which, by the goodness of the Heavenly Father, is mankind's patent of nobility; invoke the divine germ implanted in all of us; summon the inner witness of the soul; show the sinner that Holy One whom he seeks; tell him that by this Jesus he may himself become the free child of God; and then you will have faithfully discharged your duty as a Christian. Like the Scribe of the parable, you will have brought out of the treasure of truth things new and old, new as our age, old as the world, eternal as the gospel of spirit and of life!

CYRIL.

THE PAPAL POWER.

THE following sketch of the growth of the Papal power, abridged from Priestley's "History of the Corruptions of Christianity," may not be without interest at the present time for some of our readers.

When we consider that originally the bishops of Rome were nothing more than any other bishops—that is, the ministers or pastors of a society of Christians, without any power, even within their own church, besides that of exhortation and admonition—it is truly astonishing that the popes, who are no other than the successors of those bishops, should have obtained the rank and authority that they have done; and it is hardly possible to conceive how the one should have arisen from the other. There is not, indeed, in the whole history of human affairs, another example of so great a change in the condition of any order of men whatever, civil or ecclesiastical.

From being in the lowest state of persecution, in common with other Christians, and having nothing to do with things of a temporal nature, they came to be the greatest of all persecutors themselves and rose to a greater height of temporal power, (and a power established on the voluntary subjection of the mind) than almost any sovereign, the most despotic by law or constitution, ever attained. And from being mere subjects they came to be not only princes, but the most imperious lords of their former masters.

The ground of the papal pretensions to power, in later ages, was the popes being the successors of the Apostle Peter, to whom was delivered by Christ the keys of the kingdom of heaven. But whatever was meant by that expression, Peter himself assumed no pre-eminence over the rest of the Apostles. It was not till about the beginning of the seventh century that the Bishops of Rome appropriated the title of pope to themselves. Cyprian, Bishop of Carthage, had the same power that the Bishops of Rome had, namely, to assemble the bishops of his province, to preside in their councils, and to admonish his brethren.

The proper authority of the Bishop of Rome did not at first extend over the whole of Italy, but only the southern parts of it; the northern parts being subject to the Vicar of Italy, as he was called, in temporal matters, and to the Archbishop of Milan in spiritual, the Vicar of Italy residing at Milan.

The Arian controversy afforded the Bishops of Rome several opportunities of extending their power. Athanasius himself engaged the protection of Pope Julius; and it was chiefly by the influence of the see of Rome that the Trinitarian doctrine came to be established.

After the prevalence of the Mahometan powers in Asia and Africa, there remained only two rival metropolitans, namely, those of Rome and Constantinople, who were continually at variance; and at first the Bishops of Constantinople, where the emperor resided, had the advantage. John, who was chosen Patriarch of Constantinople in 585, assumed the title of Ecumenical or Universal Bishop. This title was severely condemned by Gregory the Great, who was then Bishop of Rome, as tending to diminish the power of other bishops. He even called it blasphemy, and a name invented by Satan; adding, that whoever called himself, or wished to be called, Universal Bishop, was the forerunner of Anti-Christ. Nay, upon this occasion, by way of contrast, he took the title of Servus Servorum Dei, or Servant of the Servants of God, and he was the first pope who used that style in his letters.

But not more than eighteen years after the death of this Gregory, in 606, Boniface the Third obtained of the Emperor Phocas, that the bishops of Rome should, from that time, have this very title of Universal Bishop.

The circumstance which made the assumption of this title the more odious, besides its having been rejected with so much indignation by the predecessors of Boniface, was its being granted by one who had risen to the empire by the murder of the preceding emperor Mauritius, his wife, and all his children; and who in this manner courted the friendship of the bishop of Rome, whose power in the western part of the empire was then very considerable.

It was in the reign of Valentinian the Third that, by the influence of Leo, the popes gained the greatest accession of power in the West. Before this time they had no proper authority beyond the suburban provinces. But the emperor extended their authority to all the bounds of his empire, even into Gaul, and ordered that whatever should be done in that country without the authority of the pope should have no force. The bishops assembled at Rome in 378, and approved of this augmentation of the power of the popes.

The bishops of Rome now finding their powers enlarged, and that they had the superintendence of all the Churches of the West, sent their vicars regularly into the provinces, whenever there was the least pretence for it, and thus watched any opportunity of extending their jurisdiction.

In 517, Pope Hormisdas appointed bishops of the respective countries his vicars in Gaul, Spain, and Portugal. They were glad to be so honoured, as it gave them a rank above their brethren, and by this means the popes again greatly extended their authority. After the fall of the Western empire the popes found themselves in a peculiarly favourable situation for the increase of their power, the emperor being then at a distance, and therefore obliged to take some pains to keep on good terms with them, in order to keep up his interest in the country. Thus Justinian paid the pope many compliments, and called the See of Rome the chief of all the churches, hoping by this means to drive the Goths out of Italy.

Also the people of Rome, and of the neighbouring districts, disliking both the Greeks and the northern invaders, and having no other head looked up to the popes for protection, and at length took an oath of allegiance to Gregory II., that they considered him as their chief, not as their master, meaning to form a republic, governed by its own laws.

AN APPEAL FOR THE TIME.

Oh, Luther! let thy voice once more be heard
Amid the din of warring elements:
Protest thou once again against that church
Which builds its proudest structure on the sands
Of Superstition and Tradition's lore.
Whence are its claims? what right has it to rule
In place of God over the minds of men?
Shall bold hypocrisy still hold its own,
And flaunt at Papal Courts in female gear?
Where are the men of old—the mighty men
Who, in sublime simplicity, upheld
The Gospel truth, and to a listening world
Proclaimed glad tidings? Will the angelic strain
Be heard no more in this unreal time?
Can we discern no more the good from ill?
Are there yet men who love vain pageantries,
And so degrade themselves before the world,
By pomps, and shows, and puerile grimaces?

Oh! thou, who trod the hills of Galilee
Barefoot, to spread abroad the Gospel truth—
Who, in thy simple garb and simpler speech,
Confounded e'en the wisdom of the wise;
How can thy followers thus demean themselves
Before thy glorious image? Light of men!
Oh, may thy word yet once again be heard
Through the long roll of ages. "Blest the meek
The suffering; the oppress for conscience' sake;
The poor in spirit." Are the foolish men,
Who proudly deck themselves in worldly show,
True followers of thine, oh, blessed Lord?
Deny it all the reason of the age;
Deny it, oh, ye cloud of witnesses,
That stand around the footstool of our God,
Watching o'er wayward men. Oh, righteous judge!
Uphold the right, and deprecate the wrong,
Nor weary of our groanings. For we lie
In deepest supplication for Thy aid
The darkness to illumine of this world,
That will not see the simple might of Truth.

The Unitarian Herald.

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 17, 1869.

MR. DRUMMOND AND MANCHESTER NEW COLLEGE.

THE feeling expressed towards Mr. DRUMMOND by the Cross-street congregation, and by the Mosley-street Sunday-school, at the meetings we reported in our last number, is, we believe, widely shared among the Unitarians and others in the district. The way in which Mr. DRUMMOND—a young man fresh from college when he came to Manchester—has won the love and respect—we may say more than respect—the reverence—of his own people and many others, is certainly a great encouragement to our young ministers. It shows them that if they will devote themselves faithfully to their work, with single-hearted earnestness, they will win their way. We look upon the appreciation which Mr. DRUMMOND has found as a good and healthy sign in our churches. It has always seemed to us, in listening to him, as if his mind and preaching did not reflect most what is actually strongest in the Unitarian church life, and therefore most certain of finding sympathy—we mean that religion of common life, that outward practical duty which circumstances have most developed among us: they reflect most what is weakest in that church life, and therefore finds less immediate response—the religion of piety, the inward life of conscious reverence and faithfulness to God. We cannot now enter into the causes which have made our Unitarianism strongest on the moral and practical side. We suppose the fact is sufficiently obvious. Now, whilst we may congratulate ourselves that this practical side is so strong, and whilst we would see to it that we zealously keep what we have gained, at the same time we would keep in mind that we especially do need men who will help us to develop the other side. Mr. DRUMMOND, it has seemed to us, has set himself—or rather has been set by his own character—to do this work; and the fact that in doing it he has won so much affection is very encouraging, and suggests much hope for our churches in the future. We greatly need more men of Mr. DRUMMOND's stamp, along with that practical race of workers of which it is our good fortune to have many, though not too many. We want men of contemplative minds, who enter into the thought of our age, understand its difficulties to the devotional life, and, by the power of a deep religious nature, overcome them—men like him whom Tennyson describes:

"At last, he beat his music out;
He fought his doubts and gathered strength;
He would not make his judgment blind;
He faced the spectres of the mind,
And laid them."—

We believe Mr. DRUMMOND is one of these men; and therefore, though we shall feel his loss at Manchester, we think that he is peculiarly fitted for the work to which he is called in London. He is not only fitted by his culture for the particular teaching committed to him, and by his general character to exercise a noble influence over younger minds; but he is fitted by the religious spirit of which we have spoken to help young men—especially young men who are to be the teachers and inspirers of others—in the peculiar religious difficulties of the times. These difficulties make them as much in need of sympathy as of instruction and guidance.

We are living in an age of rapid and surprising changes. A deluge of new thoughts—scientific, philosophical, political, theological—has been let loose over society, and is sapping the foundations of old opinions and faiths on every side of us. Thousands of young men, when they go forth into the world, find that the theological supports on which their religion—their very morality—were placed by their teachers are swept away, or left in a very shaky condition. And it is not every one who has energy, perhaps even capacity, enough to find out new and more lasting foundations for himself. And many, left without any such foundation, suffer, for a time at least, a sad weakening, well nigh death of the religious life. Now it may be the salvation of a young man, if he has a wise and sympathetic friend to whom he can go, and who can understand his difficulties and help him to fight his way out of them. There are many who are set up to be teachers in the present age who can give no such sympathy or help. They do not enter into the thought of the age. They sit in their little cells of antiquated theology, and dream that they are living in the sixteenth instead of the nineteenth century. If the distant murmurs of the rising waters of thought come into their cells, they only thrust their theological corks the deeper into their ears, lest they should hear them; and if the waters dash against their very walls, they only hang up thicker blinds before their windows, lest they should see them. If a young man come to any such as these with a doubt or a difficulty, hoping for sympathy, he is more likely to get a snubbing. They cannot understand him, but only put on a look of grief and astonishment, and lift up hands of holy horror at the extent to which he has listened to the suggestions of the wicked one. If the young man wants to reason with them, and asks a rational solution of his difficulties, they become hurt and angry, and finally dismiss him with the assurance that they will pray for him, an assurance which, somehow, becomes in their mouths more aggravating than a downright rating or even a hearty curse in the mouths of others.

Young men do not go a second time to gentlemen like these. No one ever thinks of opening his difficulties to them, or saying anything that may hurt their theological sensibilities. They go on utterly ignorant of what is passing in the minds around them, dreaming, dear innocent fogies, that their world at least agrees with them, because it does not think it worth while to contradict them.

We are sure our young men will not find such a teacher as this in Mr. DRUMMOND. He has found out for himself the secret which the age wants—how to preserve his religion, deep and living, in association with the freest and boldest theological thought.

DR. TEMPLE'S FAREWELL.

THE Pall Mall Gazette has a letter from Rugby, written on Sunday, by one whose object is to notice a few points in the day's doings there, for the satisfaction of those (if any such exist) who sincerely believe Dr. Temple to be an unfit man for a bishopric in the English Church.

The chapel was unable to contain the crowd of old Rugbeians who attended. Amongst those who were present, both at the morning and afternoon service, were three sons of Arnold. It was Communion Sunday, and an old Rugbeian who was present, and had not been present for a quarter of a century before, remembered that in his time generally the sixth form, with one or two exceptions, and a sprinkling of perhaps from forty to fifty in the rest of the school, stayed. To his astonishment yesterday some 230 boys kept their places, and it was touching to see how all of them tried to get to the end of the rails at which the doctor was officiating. He, before commencing the service, standing on the raised altar step, upon Arnold's grave, had said, "This is the last time I shall receive the holy communion with you as head master of this school. I beg of you all to remember me in your prayers to-day." The sermon was, as usual, at the afternoon service, following the hymn for the last Sunday before the holidays, which ends,

Let Thy Father-hand be shielding

All who here shall meet no more,

May their seed time past be yielding

Year by year a richer store.

The singing of this will not be easily forgotten.

The sermon was on Gal. vi. 2, "Bear ye one another's burthens, and so fulfil the law of Christ." This (said the preacher) new commandment of Christ, this law of love, which Paul is here referring to, our Lord and the Apostles place above all other commandments. How is this? The older dispensation had placed the fear and love of God first, then the love of neighbours. Surely the highest rule must be to love first God, then truth, holiness, justice, and after these one another. Has the Gospel sunk below the Law? No, for under the Gospel, by the incarnation of the Son of God, the two loves are united, can no longer be kept apart. There can be no love of God apart from love of man. Christ himself has pointed out this love of each other as the special mode by which he would have us acknowledge him. Let us help one another, then, at our Lord's call, by courage, by patience, by cordial and tender sympathy in joy and sorrow, by faithful warning, by resignation. There are no bounds to the help which spirit can give to spirit in the intercourse of a noble life. When parted we can still bear one another's burthens by hearty mutual trust. There is nothing which gives more firmness and constancy to the life of a man than loyal trust in absent friends. At this point the preacher paused for some seconds. In the chapel (crowded up to the altar rails by old Rugbeians, for whom rows of chairs had been brought in from the vestry) the hush was intense and painful, until, in tones which strangely brought back Arnold to those who had heard him there as boys, the preacher went on, as nearly as we can recall words which struck like pistol shots, "The time is come when we must part. I have seen many go away from this place to other scenes and other duties, as God ordained. Now I must go myself. Twelve years of my life have been spent here on the work, the lines of which were laid down by a great servant of God when I was still a boy. I have now done my part in building up that noble spiritual temple which Arnold planted on this place. I leave you; but, though parted, we can still help one another—I you, you me—by living as he taught; by the resolute sacrifice of self to duty; by the preference, at all times and in all places, of the pure, the good; by earnest search for truth; by the single eye fixed steadily on one Master, Christ. This will bind us close together still. Thus we may yet bear one another's burthens and so fulfil his law. Let us pray."

And so the teacher, whose loyalty to his Lord and his brethren men who call themselves Christians are impugning, left his work to be judged by his Master, careless, as all true servants should be, of every other judgment. Let him take courage. The judgment of all who have taken part in or known that work is with him already; and, if not sooner, yet when his life's work is over, the cry will go up from a grateful and sorrowing nation, as it rose over Arnold's early grave, "Well done thou good and faithful servant."

CHILDREN AT CHURCH.

(From the Pall Mall Gazette.)

"I HAD a happy childhood," writes Henry Crabb Robinson. "The only suffering I recollect was the restraint imposed upon me on Sundays, especially being forced to go twice to meeting, an injurious practice, I am satisfied. Once I recollect being whipped by my mother for being naughty at meeting. A sad preparation for a religious life!" A sad preparation indeed!

How intelligent parents reconcile themselves to nursery Sabbatarianism is a thing not easily understood. The most tractable children show a perversity and naughtiness under the Sunday discipline which are entirely absent during the week-time; and, except on the principle of doing evil that good may come, it would be hard to find a single argument in support of the system. In the first place, let us consider the effect of compulsory church-going on the moral and spiritual nature of childhood. Children are naturally religious; they take kindly to religious teaching when it is of a cheerful and wholesome kind; they love a little mystery, and at the same time have an unbounded hunger and thirst after dry facts. Thus devotional exercises attract them, and Biblical narrative affords endless wonder and delight. But if anything is calculated to damp the ardour and warp the aspirations of fresh young minds, it is the dreary formalism to which they are condemned, partly by mistaken zeal and partly by custom. How many of us echo feelingly Crabb Robinson's sentiment on this subject when we look back to the Sundays of our youth! The church to be reached by a long walk through rain and snow; the service long and dreary; the congregation few and cold; the sitting in dreadful enforced stillness with benumbed hands and feet and with impatient minds—how should this end but in a life-long hatred of litanies and sermons? But the miseries of a juvenile Sabbath do not end with the church service. Most likely some naughtiness or inattention during that sorrowful ordeal has entailed the punishment of so many collects to be learned or Scripture questions to be answered, and what ought to be a day of rest and happiness is turned into a day of fault and retribution. Supposing, however, that the conscientious parents or governesses are satisfied with the morning's behaviour, it does not follow that the child's paths are to be the paths of pleasantness throughout the rest of the day. The delightful nursery or schoolroom classics are put away, and when the usual Sunday lessons are over—for Sunday lessons are expected of all right-minded boys and girls—what is to be done without "Robinson Crusoe," the "Arabian Nights," and "Evenings at Home?" We ask the question advisedly, because all other amusements except reading are tabooed, and, not unnaturally, children tire of the other intellectual food catered for them.

Religious books, so-called are dry reading.

Luckily, some publishers have hit upon the clever expedient of giving magazines of a lay character religious titles, by which means parents' minds are set at ease, and the Sunday burden of many a youthful shoulder is made lighter. Making, however, very liberal allowance for this or any other distraction, the seventh day of the week generally happens to be the saddest and the least productive of good influences to the best disposed children. And how does the question affect the parents? The report is not satisfactory. Fathers and mothers who think seriously on the subject of early religious teaching are forced to acknowledge the inadequacy of the present system. They know well enough how much their own devotions are hindered by the restlessness or inattention of their children, and would fain devise a method by which some spiritual edification might be placed within their own reach without this disturbing element. But everything is against innovations affecting the Sabbath. Tradition, prejudice, and, we are bound to add, fashion, all favour the prevailing formalism in religion. Life, moreover, is made so unnecessarily anxious by the craving for a rise in the social scale, and the health, education, and dress of children are such all engrossing topics, that very little time and energy are left for others. Some people consider the rigid observance of Sunday the best means to spiritual ends; others do not trouble themselves about the matter at all; a few recognise the difficulty as we have stated it.

We have lastly to consider the third party concerned in the attendance of children at church, namely, the clergyman. Except very young curates whose nervousness forbids them bestowing any heed to their congregation whatever, we fancy few clergymen could not get on better without the consciousness of a juvenile auditory. They feel compelled to take account of these young listeners now and then, and yet cannot preach a sermon that should be, from beginning to end, within the compass of a child's mind. The painful conclusion is brought home to many a good man's mind after the long morning service, that the little ones of his flock have come unwillingly, and have gone away unedified. Now, it seems to us that a very simple and practical remedy is at hand for all this discomfort on the one hand, and dissatisfaction on the other. In some parishes a monthly service for children is performed, lasting about an hour, and in every way adapted to a youthful congregation. Why cannot this custom be extended? Surely it would be easy to give a short service on alternate Sunday afternoons so as to provide for all the young in the district. Such an arrangement might prove especially salutary among the poor. Many a working man would give up questionable amusements for the sake of taking his children to church; and, if the service were simplified, children would go to church with gladness. Again, the association of children of all classes under such circumstances could but have a humanizing effect upon their minds, thus knitting rich and poor by the common tie of Christian fellowship and love. A few easy prayers and hymns, and a short discourse illustrative of the history of the Old Testament and of the ethics of the New, would be all sufficient for the service; but we have not space to dwell upon this point. We are chiefly concerned with the existence of an absurd theory, which proposes to build up faith, hope, and charity on a superstructure of indifference, disgust, and self-deception. The inestimable quality of sincerity and the consolation of religious faith are not fostered by systematic formalism; as little are habits of cheerfulness and a leaning to the hopeful side of things encouraged by an asceticism beginning from the cradle upwards.

ROMAN CATHOLIC HYMNS.

WE offer a few more specimens of Catholic hymnology, not from any wish to depreciate good and devout Catholics, but simply to show the errors and absurdities connected with their mistaken worship. Independently of the love and devotion we owe, in singleness of heart, to our Heavenly Father—the All Good, All Kind—it is a matter worth some consideration whether the prayers offered to so many divinities may not weaken the effect of the worship itself on the mind of the devotee, besides introducing a confusion of ideas with regard to the attributes of the god or goddess addressed at the moment. Surely in this enlightened age we may be led to hope that the idolatries of Catholic worship, and its pretended miracles and mysteries, may melt away like the morning mist before the bright sunshine of purer Christianity, which presents to us in adorable simplicity the "Undivided Deity" as "Sole God and Father! Universal King!"

THE ASSUMPTION.

See to God's high temple above,
Mounts amid angel hymns of love,
The mystical ark of grace!
See aloft on victory's throne,
Blended together Mother and Son,
In one eternal embrace!

All the sorrows her bosom bore,
All her pains and afflictions sore,
At length supremely repaid;
There she reigns on the cloudless height,
Only less than the Lord of light,
In hues immortal array'd.

There she lives a fount of grace,
Ever flowing for Adam's race,
And still for ever to flow;
There, while ages on ages run,
Sweetly, sweetly she pleads with her Son
For us her children below.

Lady, than all the heavens more high,
More than seraph in purity!
A glance of pity incline.

Teach us to feel, teach us to know,
Teach us in life and death to show,
What treasures of grace are thine.

Look on this ile from the azure sky,
That bask'd so happy in days gone by,
Beneath thy dove-like reign;

Fallen away from its faith of old,
O bring it back to the Catholic fold,
And claim thy dowry again.

ENGLAND'S CONVERSION!

Whence this clang of pick and hammer,
Blent with cheers in field and town?
Ha! whence that unearthly clamour,
'Neath earth's lowest deeps far down?

There is faith once more restoring Church and convent, cross and spire;
Here perdition's host is roaring
Cries of vengeance, howls of ire!

Holy household of sweet Nazareth,
Jesus, Mary, Joseph, down
On each servant look who gathereth
Flowers for England's future crown.

FOR THE SACRAMENT.

Jesus! my Lord, my God, my all,
How can I love thee as I ought?
And how reverent this wondrous gift,
So far surpassing life or thought?

Oh! see within a creature's hand
The vast Creator deigns to be,
Reposing infant-like as though
On Joseph's arm or Mary's knee.

Thy body, soul, and Godhead all!
Oh! mystery of love divine!
I cannot compass all I have;
For all thou hast and art are mine.

Sweet Sacrament! we thee adore!
Oh! make us love thee more and more!

HYMN TO ST. DOMINIC.

Sound the mighty champion's praises;
Raise the song to him who came,
Charg'd to tell the gospel tidings,
Charg'd to spread the gospel flame:

* * * * *

Sing we to the Triune Godhead,
Honour, glory, power, and praise,
May he at our father's pleading
Deign his children's souls to raise,
Cleansed and perfect,
To his reign of endless days.

SWEET MONTH OF MAY.

Joy of our hearts! O let us pay
To thee thine own sweet month of May;
Mother of God, to us no less,
Vouchsafe a mother's sweet caress;
When mute before the Judge we stand
Our holy shield be Mary's hand,
Mary, one gift we beg of thee—
Our souls from sin and sorrow free.
Oh! Jesus, Mary, Joseph, deign
Our souls in heavenly ways to train.
Oh! Queen of Heaven! obtain that we Thy glory there one day may see;
Oh! Mother, let no child of thine
In hell's eternal exile pine.
One more request, and we have done,
With love of thee and thy dear Son
More let us burn, and more each day,
Till love of self is burn'd away.

AMERICAN NOTES.

Father Hyacinthe has declined to visit Montreal. He considers that his present duty is "silence, prayer, and expectation."

In a sermon on "Loving and hating," Ward Beecher speaks in a liberal spirit of those who separate themselves from his own communion to join other churches. We should like to have had his feeling in regard to those who pass over to our own. He says:

"There are cases where one is called to follow Christ into another church, leaving that in which he was bred. Such cases can never occur in this church, because the door out of it is just as wide as the door into it. The spirit of this church is such that, if you live Christianly, you may live in the communion of any church that you shall select on the earth. There is no denomination and no sect with us. You may go into the Presbyterian Church; and you shall go with my good-will and the good-will of your brethren. You may go into the Swedenborgian sect, and you shall carry with you my good-will and your brethren's. You may join the Episcopalians, and my hearty 'God bless you' shall go with you. You may unite yourself with the hoary old Roman Church, and still I will say 'God bless you.' There are in that Church means of grace enough to save any soul that will be faithful to its light and to its duties. And, although I think there are some churches which are far preferable to others; although I think the likelihood of becoming eminent in the Christian life is greater in some communions than in others; yet I believe there are none so far from Christ that you cannot have guiding light enough in them. So instead of fighting churches, I prefer to spend the whole force of my life in giving emphasis to the inward life of godliness. Therefore, I say to you, live as becometh the children of Christ, and then go where you please. I will not hinder you."

A correspondent of an American paper says:

"I once heard a conversation between a church member and an infidel. After arguments were urged at some length on both sides, the infidel observed to his friend that he might as well drop the subject of conversation, 'for,' said he, 'I do not believe a single word you say, and more than this, I am satisfied that you do not really believe it yourself, for to my certain knowledge you have not given, for the last twenty years, as much for the spread of Christianity—such as the building of churches, foreign and domestic missions—as your last Durham cow cost. Why, sir, if I believed one-half of what you say you believe, I would make the church my rule for giving, and my farm the exception.'"

A gentleman of Boston, who takes a business view of most things, when recently asked respecting a person of a very poetic temperament, replied, "Oh, he is one of those men who have soarings after the infinite, and divings after the unfathomable, but who never pay cash." This seems at present to be a rapidly increasing family.

One of the catechisms of the American Episcopal Church thus explains the mathematics of the Trinity for the benefit of its little ones:

Q. "What miraculous event took place after the baptism of Jesus?"

A. The heavens were opened and a voice was heard from heaven saying, 'This is My beloved Son in whom I am well pleased.'

Q. Who spoke these words?

A. God the Father.

Q. Who stood on the banks of the Jordan and heard them?

A. God the Son.

Q. Who came down from heaven in the form of a dove?

A. God the Holy Ghost.

Q. What does this teach us about God?

A. That He is three as well as one.

Q. Is God one person?

A. No. He is three.

Q. But are there three Gods?

A. No, the three persons are one God.

Q. What do we call this doctrine?

A. The doctrine of the Holy Trinity."

FIRESIDE READINGS.

THE SWEETER SONG.

The simple singers of forgotten years,
From dim, sweet hearts filled full of mysteries,
Gave artless welcome to the beautiful,
In fervent speech with silvery cadences;
And when their souls were calmed with utterance,
The earth was richer in a sunny song!
Glad-faced they listened to the voiceful world:
The wayward wind came from its unknown land,
Humming a roundelay of tumbling waves,
And blanched the wrinkles of the olden sea,
Then whistled carelessly, trailed cloud on cloud,
And piled them broadly 'gainst the o'erflowing dawn,
Till the warm lights were blackened down and quenched.

By massy shadows, capped with clouds ablaze,
Like fiery offerings to the wrathful gods!
From pleassance to frail doubt and misty words
The prophets wander'd now dim-hearted, sad,
At the strong thunder reeling through the sky
Cut through with arrowy flame; while people fell
And cried through fierce wind that the earth was cursed!

So, when the air grew thick and hot, the shock
Of forces mighty in renewing change,
Heaved, tore the land, and with unheeding might Flung out a fiery deluge from some hell
Wide gaping on a mountain top; the sea
Was troubled, and its stricken waves recoiled,
And curling rushed on unfamiliar shores,
Which, helped by storm and sun and wind and rain,

Have grown and blossomed to the high All-wise!
Poor hearts! unlearned but by inconstant days,

Wrapt round with awe at sea, and earth and air,
And changeful mood of noon, and starless nights,
Gave sun and peace to favoured gods, and clothed
With darkness famine, death—some ruthless power
Who crushed them down because their hands were weak.

Blow round, ye years! and bring the manly mind,
Freed from the tyranny of outward sense,
To search and search the hidden cause and aim,
Striving to follow the great touch of God
In manifold strange ways to one good end—
In life and truth, on earth and seas and suns!
With wider ages came unwearied souls
To minister, unswerving to the death.
O let our hearts grow great with naming them,
The saviours of the nations of the earth,
The labourers for light, the sons of God!
To-day wing'd souls are with us, bearing on
To higher conquests truths so highly won,
And ere the fainting hero's light is spent
'Tis borne aloft by swifter youthful hearts.
But still dim superstition blots and blinds
Where some weak souls, in lingering ignorance,
Moan of a fancied curse, amid the light
Of love unutterable round them thrown.
Rise into manhood O my singing soul!
The earth is sweet in dew-songs and in flowers,
And lovely in sweet scenes of leaf and dell,
And mighty in great mountains, waters, plains,
And terrible in cataract and chasm,
And rich in perfect women full of love,
Brave hearted men and strangers to the false,
And grand in nations working for the good,
And righteous in the love of man and man!
Faint now and fail ye dusty books and books,
Ye cannot hold nor give the living God!
But free and bold we search the rapid mind,
The multitude of longings in the soul,
The unfailing earth, through snowy days and sun,
And feel His presence in the glory there.
O sweet spring wind, come bless and kiss the world,
And every kiss will spring and bud a flower,
To gladden and upraise the fainting hearts
With impulses divine; and when they rest
For one short hour beneath the windy trees,
And hear the breezy lisp of the stream,
Or hold communion with a sister-soul—
The sweet repayments for long days of toil—
Then blow and kiss them on the hair and lips,
And they will sing for very joy! O man,
A daisy's worth is more than all the creeds,
And one pure violet is God with us!
O, north wind clear and cold stray through the trees,
And make their lonely branches bare and bold,
Stripped bravely for the contest; swiftly bring Rich vigour to the languid, weary pulse,
And while the earth is full of sun and sweat,
Grow into manhood, O my singing soul!

UNCOMFORTABLE PEOPLE.

THE uncomfortable people of this world are capable of being classified under as many heads as an old-fashioned sermon. We have to run the gauntlet of them as we do of infant diseases; but there are a few marked types that everybody recognises at first sight.

There is the fidgety man, who brings a rash out on your mental complexion by his restless, suspicious nature. He is always setting traps for the servants, and shaking your faith in the front-door lock, and raising the most unwarrantable suspicions about housebreakers and midnight marauders. You are in perpetual dread of his shooting the gardener by mistake, or catching the baby in one of his man-traps.

In contrast to him, we have the man entirely devoid of caution, who is taken care of and saved from all manner of fatal accidents, heaven only knows how. It is enough to throw one into a nervous fever to have him for a travelling companion, even on a short trip. At every station he gets out and moves round the platform, evidently for the sole purpose of making a dive at the carriage after it has got under way. You crane your neck out of the window to beckon to him, in an agony of dread. One, two short, sharp shrieks of the engine, and you are moving away, wholly ignorant as to whether he is left behind, or has been crushed in the effort to get in. This painful excitement lasts, as he does not make his appearance until you are nearing the next station, when he generally turns up just in time to repeat the experiment, and re-set the edge of your nervous system. This type of being has many and divers ways of making himself thoroughly uncomfortable to others. The bumps of order seem to have been forgotten or overlooked in his construction. He manages his affairs by a species of mental arithmetic that can never be imparted to another, and so lax is he in the matter of keeping papers and books that a cold shiver runs over you every time you think of his possible sudden demise, for there is not a creature living who could thoroughly understand the condition of his affairs. Every now and then a breeze is raised in the household to know what has become of the deed of the place, or the insurance policy, or that fifty pound note he took of Jones; and a dozen times a year he imagines he has been ruined by his own carelessness, but still he does not mend.

It is this man, or his brother, who invites company to dinner on washing-day without knowing whether his wife has a scrap of anything cooked in the house. He is sublimely idiotic about domestic matters, and to his comprehension a dinner is cooked and served up by a kind of happy accident. He has no comprehension of cause and effect, and his imagination is not vivid enough to picture to him that the wash will have to be set aside for that day, and some one sent to the butcher's, and some one else to the baker's; that next day perhaps it will rain, so that the maid cannot dry her clothes, which drag around until she becomes disgusted and gives notice to quit. So great a matter a little fire kindleth.

There is an aggravated female species of the genus uncomfortable person, easily distinguished. She never meets you without informing you that you're looking badly, are thin, overworked, used up. Aside from wounded vanity, this species of salutation awakens unpleasant emotions. It may be possible that you are going into a decline so subtle in its progress that it has escaped the criticism of your own eyes. You go home and look in the glass, examine your tongue, and feel your pulse until you are ready to pronounce yourself ill. A person of this class is always a cheerful sick-room visitor. She has not any malice in her heart, but it slips out sooner or later that the patient looks just as her poor, dear sister Jane did before she died of dropsy. A consolatory old lady once met a young friend not remarkable for her beauty. "Dear me! Helen," she said, looking at her with a sigh, "you were a lovely child, but how you have changed!" Helen went on her way beamingly of course.

There is a certain kind of brutality and a certain kind of boorishness which one finds it very hard to put up with. There is the husband who is always saying sharp, cutting things to his wife under the cover of a polite smile, and the wife who snubs her husband unmercifully before company, and people whose habits are noticeably bad at the table. In manners, a great deal is claimed for early advantages, and excused for the want of them; but there are few considerations that should excuse a man for picking his teeth with his fork, or indulging in a species of piggishness calculated to inspire disgust in his neighbours.

People who emphasize very strongly the difference between their position and your own, whether they happen to be richer or poorer than you are, generally make themselves uncomfortable companions. There are certain reduced folk, of the poor but proud species, who will never let you forget for an instant that they have known better days, and are now down in the world. Purse-proud arrogance is always a good, broad mark for scorn, but, in its way, this kind of humble-pie eating, which really covers bitter discontent with fortune, is quite as despicable. There are others, especially in small villages, who set themselves up as models of propriety in all the minor matters of appearance, and attempt to thrust their standard upon you for adoption. They are the superior people who are quoted in little communities, and generally belong to the first families. If they had their way, they would reduce society to a flat waste, a dead level of mediocrity and dullness. They are for ever trying to get you to adopt their little weights and measures. Mrs. So-and-So has pound-cake for tea, and if you venture to substitute sponge-cake you are a social heretic. These persons take undue liberties with your manners and your dress. They criticize your collars and your gloves, and all their satellites echo the sound. When they meet you, they look you over, and then they go away and talk you over.

Perhaps, however, the last described are more endurable than the sharp-eyed, inquisitive visitors who come into one's house occasionally, on pretence of friendship and good-will, but really to spy out the land. There is your female friend, insane on the subject of dirt, who counts every fly-speck. Her glance is microscopic. She can tell instantly whether you use a dust-rag or a feather-flirt. She sees just where you slighted a little that day you had the headache, and before she leaves you she manages to put you in the position of the toad under the harrow.

The prospective of uncomfortable people seems to extend itself indefinitely as I gaze; but it is only the contemplation of evils that makes our blessings more apparent; so I say God bless all the genial, loveable folks who put us more at ease with ourselves than we ever are or should be without them. Liberal Christian.

THE MODERN PHARAOH.

THE Friend of India tells the following story of the last visit of the Pasha of Egypt to this country. It may be remembered that a grand musical entertainment was given to his Highness at the Crystal Palace. Now if the Mahommedan hates anything it is European harmony. But the thing was not to be escaped. While 500 fiddlers and twice that number of singers are ravishing the ear with "Israel in Egypt," the Viceroy, worn out, sleeps quietly, his fez cap pulled well down. At length, amid a mighty crash of horn and cymbal, his Excellency, hands to head, starts into consciousness, almost dismay. "Ah!" remarks some officious toady, misled by the act, "that is the passage of the Red Sea by the Israelites." "What! Israelites cross the Red Sea, leave Egypt," shrieks the indignant Viceroy. "I will telegraph at once and stop them." However imaginary the incident may be, it is a severe commentary on the monetary dealings and misrule of the Pasha.

NEGRO COMMUNICATIVENESS.

IN one of his letters to the Guardian from America, the Rev. Harry Jones introduces the following, when describing a visit which he paid to the White House at Washington:—I saw no one about, no sentries, no servants of any kind. A soldier's horse was tied up at the entrance, but everything stood quiet and still in the bright sunshine. Presently four people, Americans, whom I had seen doing the sights of Washington, and whom, indeed, I had not long before directed to the spiral staircase which leads up the dome of the Capitol, came sauntering out. They walked away, and the door was shut behind them. Another orderly rode up, tied his horse to a ring in the portico, and walked in. I turned aside, and was strolling off, supposing the White House was closed to visitors for the day, when an old negress came smiling out by some side door.

"Mornin', sar," said she. "Mornin', marm," said I. I supposed her to be a sort of Aunt Sally among the servants, and asked her if the house was still open. "Bless you, sar," she replied, "I've been there three hours; but I didn't see the President after all." "Did you want to see him?" "Yes, sar; wages very low, work scarce." "Did you expect him to find you any?" "Well, sar, I thought I'd go and see, but he is busy." Then she volunteered her opinion on his fitness for his post, and praised Lincoln. "Ah! I do believe he was a Christian."

Negroes are monstrously communicative. Unlike Americans, they frequently begin the conversation, and are generally very ambitious in their choice of subjects. The negro's talk is as large as his lips. He is always contemplating a long journey, or delivering himself about the greatest matters and the biggest people. The black barber talks of setting up business in London. The boots at the hotel discuss the relation between Canada and the United States. A man who sold pears to us in the train to Richmond mixed up his opinion of Henry Clay, à propos to nothing, with his offers of fruit. This negress laid down the law about the qualifications of the chief magistrate with most entertaining decision, and was quite sincere in intending to place her special necessities before none less than the President himself. There was a grotesque pathos in the faith she felt in her appeal to the head of the Government. But he was busy. Busy! I should think so, if he has to listen to every personal tale.

A CHARM AGAINST JEALOUSY.

A CURIOUS picture of Arab life has just been exhibited before the Court of Assize at Constantina, in Algeria. A native, named Ben-Kemmari, was accused of mutilating his wife by cutting off her nose and upper lip in a fit of jealousy. The mother of the victim said that to cure her son-in-law of his jealousy, she had consulted a much venerated Marabout, who had given her as a charm for her daughter a serpent's head wrapped up in hemp leaves, which was to be placed in the folds of the husband's turban. The woman appealed to the public present to prove that by this method she would have cured the man of his suspicions, and several Arabs at once took off their head-gear and triumphantly showed the same talisman, while a native officer of the court, without being consulted, called out to the judge, "Yes, I have also a serpent's head; it gives strength to the man and fidelity to the woman." The prisoner was sentenced to eight years' hard labour.

INTELLIGENCE.

BALLYMONEY.—On Sunday, December 12th, the religious services of the Unitarian Church were rendered more than usually interesting by the introduction of a harmonium. This, and a new choir, formed a few months ago, are promising signs of self-help.

DUDLEY.—The Unitarian Chapel in this town was reopened last Sunday. The congregation has met for worship during the last six months in the girls' school, while the chapel has undergone a complete change in the interior, costing about £800. Between £600 and £700 had been obtained before the opening services, which were conducted by the Rev. William James, of Bristol. The London Liturgy was used for the first time on this occasion; and the new organ, built by Messrs. Bishop and Starr, of London, was played by Mr. Heap, of Birmingham. Both sermons were very appropriate. The congregation in the morning was large, notwithstanding a violent snowstorm just before the service; and in the evening, which was fine, the chapel was quite full, about 450 being present. The collections amounted to £46. 8s. 8½d.

The work has been done most satisfactorily by Messrs. Bodin and Grove, of High-street, and by Mr. Humphrey, of the Inhedge—all members of the congregation. Every one seemed greatly pleased with the alterations, and we trust that the improvement in their place of prayer will have a beneficial influence on the Unitarian Church in Dudley.

MARYBOROUGH, QUEENSLAND.—About four years ago Mr. William McDonald left England for this place. Before he went he had been an active member of the Lower Mosley-street Schools and of the Natural History Society connected with them, and at various times he has sent specimens of natural history and letters to his old friends. We are glad to learn from the Maryborough Chronicle of August 28, 1869, that about three years ago he opened a Sunday-school in his own house, while a Mr. Case conducted public worship a little higher up the river. As the wants of the colony increased, the two sought to satisfy them. One gentleman gave the land, the timber-getters gave logs of wood, while a firm of cutters cut the logs up at a considerable reduction, and another firm built the chapel for £40. It was opened free of debt, and upwards of 300 persons were present—many of whom had been conveyed 20 miles up the river, free of cost, by the owner of a steamer.

POOLE.—The first anniversary of the new chapel was held on Sunday last. The services were conducted by the Rev. R. Spears, and the congregations were large both morning and evening, many members of other churches being present. The tea meeting was held in the Temperance Hall on Monday evening, presided over by the Rev. J. Cropper, M.A., formerly of Stand. Upwards of one hundred were present, and the meeting was addressed by the ministers from Kingwood, and Wareham, and by several other friends. During the past two months the debt on this handsome and well-situated chapel has been reduced from £310 to £48. A few years ago it was considered in Poole and the neighbourhood that the Unitarian cause was well nigh defunct in that part of Dorsetshire, and now through the energy of a lay preacher, Mr. Balston, and four or five other members, Poole bids fair to be the centre in that district of a more healthy and useful organisation than has been known there for many years. The few families have given liberally of their time and their money, and are still worthy of all the help of our denomination, so that they may soon have a pastor among them.

A WORD FOR CAERMARTHEN COLLEGE.

To the Editors.—According to the report in your last of the Rev. James Drummond's farewell speech, he said, with reference to Manchester New College, "Our college, I believe, is the only theological college in this kingdom which is based on principles of entire religious freedom. Its professors are chosen for their qualifications of character and intellect, and its students are fettered by no articles while they pursue their studies." Mr. Drummond cannot be aware of the constitution of Caermarthen College, the oldest Dissenting academy in the kingdom. Here no theological test whatever is imposed on either students or tutors: and consequently students of half-a-dozen different denominations resort to Caermarthen and work together in perfect harmony; whilst, of the tutors, two are Unitarian ministers, and the third (occupying the chair of theology) is an orthodox Independent minister.—Yours truly, KENTISH BACHE.

HELP NEEDED FOR THE POOR.

To the Editors.—Will you permit me to draw the attention of the friends of the Carter-lane Mission, and others who may be disposed to help us, to the advertisement which appears in another part of your paper. I wish to remind your readers that the distress existing in the metropolis, and of which so much has lately been heard, is by no means unknown in our district. Besides the many cases among our own people calling for assistance, I have on my list at the present time several families who have been reduced from very very comfortable circumstances to the verge of starvation. Fever, too, has invaded our locality and had its victims among our scholars, many of whom, through the low state of bodily health brought about by shortness of food, are predisposed to this or any other disease. At the beginning of winter, foreseeing these things, I waited on the rector of our parish, for the purpose of setting on foot, if possible, some plan for the regular, systematic, and adequate relief of the poor around us. I failed in the object

I had in view, and was thrown back on my own individual efforts. The best thing I could do, it seemed to me, was to open our soup kitchen. By this means I have been able to distribute about 160 dinners per week of excellent soup and bread, at a small charge. This, however, has been amongst our scholars only, and this great blessing, as far as it goes, it will be easily seen, leaves a large amount of want and privation untouched. It is that I may extend the benefits of our kitchen to the adult poor and sick around us that I now make this appeal. Besides the children's dinners, I purpose distributing from eighty to one hundred and fifty warm and nourishing meals per week, at a small charge, to persons with whom I am well acquainted, and of whose needy circumstances I have only too much reason to be convinced. The smallest help to this end will be thankfully received by the persons whose names appear in conjunction with, yours very truly,
J. TAYLOR.

TEACHERS' SOCIAL MEETINGS.

To the Editors.—In your report of the London Auxiliary Sunday-school Association meeting, at Carter Lane, on the 24th ult., I notice a curious mistake on some one's part. With reference to more frequent meetings among our teachers for friendly intercourse, Mr. Taylor (Clerkenwell) is reported to have recommended for our adoption a plan existing (?) among the Wesleyans, of having such meetings as are referred to on—Sunday evenings (sic).

As I have some knowledge of the real plan on which these meetings are conducted by our brethren, you will, I trust, allow me this opportunity of explaining it to your readers, and thus clearing off a notion, unjust to our contemporaries, the Wesleyan Methodists, who, as a rule, are strict Sabbatharians; most assuredly they never did and, in all probability, never will hold such gatherings on Sunday evenings.

It is well known that the Wesleyan chapels are divided into circuits, consisting generally of three congregations and three ministers, of whom the senior (in standing) is president of the circuit. A Sunday-school is attached to each of these congregations, and these Sunday-schools form of themselves a circuit or union. A committee is formed by two representative teachers from each school. This committee has the management of affairs relating to the social meeting only, which occurs once in every three months. Generally, the place of meeting is taken in rotation, thus: the first meeting is held in the schoolroom of A chapel, the second in the schoolroom of B chapel, and the third in the C schoolroom; so that each body of teachers in turn become the hosts. The managing committee appoint some teacher or superintendent, to read a paper after the tea on matters interesting and useful to teachers. After the reading of this paper, any business connected with the union is transacted, and on the conclusion of such business, any spare time is devoted to discussion, bearing on the essay of the evening.

The chairman of these meetings is almost always the President of the Circuit.

I should perhaps mention that this plan is not yet universally adopted, as distance generally presents an almost insuperable bar to meetings of this description in the country; but in large towns the idea is rapidly being taken up, and brought into execution with much success.

I think I have here placed in as concise a form as possible, all the information with regard to these necessary meetings, but should any one desire fuller details I shall be happy to supply them (with your permission) through your correspondence columns. Yours, &c.,
HENRY A. HALL.

THE NATIONAL EDUCATION LEAGUE.

To the Editors.—I would earnestly beg Unitarians in particular, not to be misled by the profession of the League, that the schools it seeks to establish shall be "unsectarian." When Mr. Dixon says, as he did here the other day, that the schools will be unsectarian, inasmuch as they will be schools in which "no creed or catechism" will be used, and in which the Bible will be read "without note or comment," he no doubt means what he says; but that, I submit, is not sufficient, for the terms are ambiguous, and even if their meaning were clear, I do not see what power the League has to insure perfect catholicity on the part of school managers and teachers.

Many years ago, the British and Foreign School Society was started with precisely the same programme. All its schools were to be "unsectarian"—schools in which the Bible was to be read without note or comment—in which no "peculiar religious tenets" were to be taught, and which should not "exclude the aid of any persons professing to be Christians."

It was scarcely possible to devise a more comprehensive, promissory, "unsectarian" scheme. On the strength of these (mis)representations many wealthy and influential Unitarians worked on the society's committee, subscribed liberally to its funds, and bequeathed legacies to it. After a while, however, they found that the doctrines of total depravity, eternal torments, the deity of Christ, and the Trinity, were openly taught in the schools. When they remonstrated they were coolly told that as Trinitarians were not a sect, their (Trinitarian) teaching was not sectarian teaching, and that as Trinitarians were not a "peculiar" religious people, Trinitarian doctrines were not "peculiar" tenets! It was found that though no printed notes or comments were used the teachers were allowed to give their own Trinitarian, viva voce comments, although the society had publicly declared, in a printed address, that the children were left "entirely to the explanations and commentaries which their parents and friends may think fit to give them at home."

The league cannot make more satisfactory, more catholic professions than this society, and I do not see how it can do more to prevent their being broken. That being so, Unitarians have no better guarantee at present than the British and Foreign School Society gave for the really unsectarian character of its schools, and are not safe in giving their adherence to the league.

In all educational plans that prescribe Bible reading, the mode should be prescribed, for much will depend on that. When the Bible is read by the master or mistress, at the opening or close of the school, it is possible for it to be read inoffensively; but when read in classes, under the direction of pupil teachers or monitors, it is impossible. I am, gentlemen, yours truly,
B. TEMPLAR.

Those ladies who have not yet used the Glenfield Starch are respectfully solicited to give it a trial, and carefully follow out the directions printed on every package. FALLOWFIELD SCHOOLS.—The Committee beg to announce that the above Schools will be OPENED on the 19th of January, 1870, by a PUBLIC SOIREE.

LONGTON.—The Unitarian congregation meeting in this town are very desirous to erect a more suitable place of worship than the one they at present have. For a long time they have had to hold their religious services in a room of a public-house, situated in a back street. The success of the Unitarian cause is injured, in this part of the country, by the building in which its claims are advocated. It is often said, if there were a chapel instead of a public-house room to meet in, many persons who sympathise with us would attend the services.

There is another consideration which urges the congregation to get a place worthy of the views they hold of the religion of Jesus Christ. At present there is no Sunday-school in connection with the society, as the person who lets the room for the religious services will not allow it to be used for a Sunday-school.

Longton is a rapidly increasing municipal town in the Staffordshire potteries. It also forms part of the parliamentary borough of Stoke-upon-Trent. Collected around the site of the proposed chapel at a very short distance there is a population of thirty thousand inhabitants: a wide field here presents itself to those who are engaged in teaching the pure and simple doctrines of the Gospel.

The congregation is composed chiefly of working people; they have, as stated above, secured a site, and they have contributed according to their means towards building a place of worship, the cost of which they estimate at about £500.

As the congregation strongly feel that there is a reasonable prospect of much more good being done if they had a chapel of their own, they therefore cast themselves upon the generosity of their Unitarian brethren to assist in erecting one, and they appeal to the kindness of all those who are desirous to promote the success of liberal Christianity and the religious instruction of the young.

The following gentlemen will be Trustees in conjunction with other gentlemen living in the locality:—

George Melly, Esq., M.P., Rev. Brooke Herford, Manchester.

Rev. Benjamin Glover, Crews, Rev. Robert Spears, London.

In addition the following subscriptions, which have been promised, two gentlemen will give £100 providing the remaining sum of (£400) be raised.

THE TRUTHSEEKER, Edited by the Rev. J. PAGE HOPPS, has been in existence for nearly seven years; during which time it has given "aid and comfort" to all who were striving to bring a little nearer that good time when the light of Reason, which is the true light of God, will be allowed to shine on all and be thankfully welcomed by all; and when the discoverer in matters pertaining to religion will be honoured and revered, and not, as now, smitten on the mouth and cast out.

With the New Year will begin a New Series of The Truthseeker; and the opportunity will be taken to make such changes as experience has proved to be desirable. For the future, every number will be, as far as possible, complete in itself; and Articles will not be continued for any length of time, from month to month. During the year, two series of Papers, by the Editor, will appear, together with Reviews and other contributions of passing or permanent interest.

In his own name, and in the names of his immediate co-workers, the Editor appeals for help to those who believe that Religion ought to be reasonable and that Christianity ought to be intelligible. The "help" he asks for is simply such help as every one can give who will admit The Truthseeker into his home, give it an honest hearing, and commend it, if approved, to inquiring and receptive minds. These are not times for the silencing of even the humblest voice that is raised on behalf of a religious Faith that neither insults God nor degrades man. To those who feel this, the Editor now commits a work that has long been dear to him. It is for them, in a great measure, to determine what its future shall be.

THE TRUTHSEEKER, containing "Thoughts for the Summer Days and Winter Nights of Life," by the Editor, together with contributions of general interest, is now ready. Price Threepence.—London: Trübner and Co. Manchester: Johnson and Rawson; and all agents and booksellers.

[For 4s. a year (sent to the Rev. J. Page Hopps, Queen's Park, Glasgow) a copy of The Truthseeker will be sent regularly, to any address, post free.]

On the last of every month.

"THE TRUTHSEEKER, a Review, devoted to the advocacy of reverent free thought in matters pertaining to Religion." Edited by the Rev. J. PAGE HOPPS. Price Threepence.

London: Trübner and Co., 89, Paternoster-row. Manchester: Johnson and Rawson, and John Heywood; and through all booksellers and agents.

"A DECLARATION OF THE SCRIPTURAL PRINCIPLES OF UNITARIAN CHRISTIANITY," in tract form, with the texts in full. 6d. per doz.; 8s. per 100, post free, from Rev. GOODWYN BARMBY, Band of Faith Office, Walsfield.

WHAT THE CHURCHES ARE DOING.

At the last meeting of the Bible Society Committee, some interesting statements were given of the advances which Christianity has recently made in Madagascar. It may be remembered that the Queen, on ascending the throne about two years ago, declared herself a Christian. When the foundation-stone of the Chapel Royal was laid, the fence round the building in which the great national idol was kept, in a village some seven miles from the capital, was ordered to be pulled down. The keepers of the fetish became enraged at this, and muttered threats of vengeance, hinting that the god had medicine and intended to use it; as much as to say that the Queen would be poisoned. In this threatening temper they came to court; a council of state was called, and while they were detained in the capital, an express was sent off to put an end to the imposture for ever. No opposition was offered by the people. They gathered round while the house was burned with the materials of the broken fence, and curiously watched what would come of it. First, the appurtenances of the idol were consumed—his long cane, the bullocks' horns from which the sacred sprinklings were made, his three scarlet umbrellas, and his silk gown; then his case; and lastly, the formidable deity himself who rendered the sovereign invincible, preserved from fire, from crocodiles, from infection, and in battle—the great god of Madagascar, worshipped for generations, and the object of fear to thousands, was brought out. Scarcely anybody but his keepers had ever seen him, and when he proved to be a bit of shapeless wood about as big as a man's thumb, with a couple of scarlet silk wings, no wonder that "all seemed astonished at his insignificance." Still the crowd exclaimed "You cannot burn him, he is a god;" to which the Christian officers replied, "We are going to try," and while the sham deity was enveloped in flames it was held up on a stick that all might see it consume. A number of other idols were afterwards burned, without any remonstrance from the people. The inhabitants of the villages, seeing that they had no longer any gods left to worship, sent to the Queen to ask what their religion was to be for the future, and who was to teach them the knowledge of the true God. The missionaries and native pastors were summoned to the Prime Minister's house, and he wisely suggested that the responsibility of supplying them with teachers should be devolved on the churches already existing, and that the Government should have nothing to do with the matter; that the churches should make collections, in which the Chapel Royal should share, and thus the expense of sending teachers be defrayed. A list of 280 villages in Imerina, the province in which the capital is, was made out, and of these it was found that 120 were already supplied with pastors. Native teachers were selected from the churches in Antananarivo for the 160 others, and thus the whole district was brought at once under Christian instruction.

The announcement seems to have been premature which we made last week that the law had been wiped from the Swedish statute book which rendered everybody who taught or preached anything but "the pure Evangelical faith" according to the Augsburg Confession liable to fine and imprisonment. A correspondent sends an account to the English Independent of the recent prosecution of a Mr. Ambrosius, apparently at the instance of the rector of the parish in which he had dared to preach and baptize. He was fined 75 dollars, which, with the costs, amounted to about £22. A seizure was made on his premises, and a sledge and country wagon, four copper kettles and a clock, were the price he had to pay for exercising the liberty of prophesying. The statute under which he was convicted was passed in 1860, and is a neat and simple formula of persecution of which Sheldon and the framers of the Five Mile Act might have been proud. It runs thus:—"Whosoever shall, with a view of gaining proselytes, publicly proclaim, or in any other way disseminate religious doctrines, contrary to the pure Evangelical faith, shall be fined from 50 to 300 rix-dollars, or imprisoned from two months to a year."

It is not often that we find ourselves in agreement with Church courts; but we must admit that the Consistory to which he belonged had some reason for censuring and declaring unworthy of his trust a Dr. Mook, a clergyman in the Bavarian Palatinate, who could make use of language like this:

"The gulf which exists in the Church between faith and knowledge it is now more than ever impossible to fill up. In no place are more lies told than in the pulpit. No assembly represents less knowledge and cultivation than one come together for public worship. If the multiplication table were prayed there would be more sense in it than in the so-called Apostolic Creed. The belauded freedom of teaching is a demonstrably empty form. The faith contained therein is a homœopathic tincture, to which every century has added a drop of distilled lunacy."

The Anti-Council, which was dissolved by the Italian Government after it had held two sittings in Naples, has adjourned till next September. It will then meet in Switzerland. While awaiting the moment in which it can proclaim its views "on thoroughly free soil" it once more protests against the violation of its rights, and publishes a declaration of its principles, in which the necessity of abolishing all official Churches is affirmed.

An Apostolic Constitution has just been promulgated by the Holy See, which seems a little hard on such of our "priests" as are yearning for a sort of ecclesiastical concubinage between Anglicanism and Romanism. It limits and defines former Church censures, and its general effect is to withdraw to the cognizance of the Pope, for the purposes of absolution, a great number of cases which heretofore have been disposed of by the local authorities, reserving to these the power of absolving only in articulo mortis. Excommunication is re-affirmed against all heretics, "to whatever sect they may belong;" against all schismatics, and "those who obstinately refuse obedience to the Sovereign Pontiff" and against all "who appeal from the commands and decisions of the Roman Pontiffs to a future General Council."

Father Hyacinthe has arrived in Paris. Before leaving America he deviated from the rule which he had set himself in his visit there, and delivered a lecture in New York in aid of the French Benevolent Society established in that city. He said in explanation of this, that although he was in the United States to seek repose and to be silent, he could not resist the appeal made to him on behalf of his suffering fellow-countrymen. The subject of his lecture was the Government of Life. When he appeared on the platform the reception he met with was so warm that he was sensibly affected by it, and the lecture throughout was much applauded.

The Rev. J. C. Ryle's letters to the Record on Reforms in the Church are to be published in a separate form. Archdeacon Allen having taken him to task for too much "preparatory rhetoric" as to how he expects to frighten people by his proposals, he says in reply, "they have already frightened many people very much indeed, and are thought most dangerous, most revolutionary, and most destructive." This, however, is nothing new. Ever since we could recollect anything, the Establishment has been constantly "in danger."

It is stated that the bishopric of Sierra Leone, now vacant, has been offered to the Rev. Dr. Massingham, of Warrington, who a short time ago made himself so notorious by his misstatements as a lecturer in support of the union of Church and State. As Nonconformists we should be sorry to lose his help.

The death of Dr. Lee, Bishop of Manchester, places another bishopric at Mr. Gladstone's disposal—the seventh to which he has been called to nominate during his thirteen months of office as Premier.

The Moderator of the General Assembly of the Irish Presbyterian Church has issued a circular calling a special meeting of the Assembly at Belfast on the 25th January, to take into consideration the financial position of the Church as affected by the Irish Church Bill, and to adopt measures suitable to the occasion.

The Rev. W. G. Clark, Vice-Master of Trinity College, Cambridge, and late Public Orator of the University, has written a letter to the Bishop of Ely, as his diocesan, in which he thus honestly gives his reasons for resigning "holy orders:"

"Slowly and reluctantly I have been driven to conclusions incompatible with the declarations which I made at my ordination. For instance, in the 'Ordering of Deacons,' a candidate is asked whether he 'unfeignedly believes all the Canonical Scriptures of the Old and New Testament?' This question, taking the words in their natural sense, I could not now conscientiously answer in the affirmative. In the 'Ordering of Priests,' several of the questions addressed by the bishop to the deacons evidently assume the infallibility of the Scriptures. The same doctrine is implied in the 6th and 8th Articles, and in the 36th Canon. I no longer think it tenable. Some portions of the 'Canonical Scriptures' now seem to me to be of doubtful genuineness, and others to contain erroneous statements in history, and questionable teaching in theology and morals. There are passages in the Liturgy which I cannot now repeat with full assent. I cannot stand beside the altar and say, in the face of the congregation, 'God spake these words,' when I am convinced that He did not speak them. Under these circumstances, I beg to signify to you my desire to relinquish the position of a clergyman and to resume that of a layman. Whatever law, written or unwritten, may prevent me from doing this, I protest against as iniquitous and immoral, because it conflicts with the natural right and bounden duty of every man, all his life long, to search for and proclaim the truth."

The Ritual Commissioners have not been able to carry out the Archbishop of Canterbury's wish that they should give in their report before Christmas. Two more meetings are to be held before Parliamentary assemblies: the first to endorse the recommendations of the Lectionary Committee; and the second to consider Mr. Walpole's general report, which is understood to be opposed to the views of the extreme High Church party. It must be allowed that the commissioners have given plenty of time to the matter, with what success remains to be seen.

Ritualism has not had a quiet time of it lately. In the celebrations of the London Twelve Days' Mission one of the most prominent actors was the Rev. George Body, of Wolverhampton, and on his return home he undertook to deliver an address on the subject, and there was a large gathering to hear it. But in the course of it he was interrupted by an anti-Ritualistic demonstration, and the uproar was so great that the police had to be called in to clear the room.—One of the headquarters of the High Church revival was St. Lawrence Jewry, and the practices there have led to much angry feeling among the parishioners, who took steps to check them, by making representations to the Archdeacon of London. In consequence he attended the services twice, and he states that many of the persons looked like Roman Catholic rather than Protestant worshippers, and that the ceremonial was altogether different from that to which the Church of England was accustomed. The Bishop of London has been communicated with on the subject, but his decision is not yet known.—At St. Luke's Church, in one of the Midland towns, where Ritualistic practices were indulged in, some parishioner, of a waggish turn, chalked on the doors:—"St. Luke's Junction—Change here for Rome!"

There has been another warm discussion in the London Presbytery on the "box o' whistles" question. One party were in favour of allowing congregations to introduce instrumental music if they chose; but the other party, led by the Rev. T. Halkin, were of his opinion that such music was "un-Presbyterian," and that the organ was "one of the marks of the beast." The question promises to afford matter for exciting debate for some time to come, and at present seems likely to conduce to anything but harmony.

Mr. McLaren, in addressing his constituents at Edinburgh, stated that he and his colleague, Mr. Miller, are to introduce next session their Bill for the settlement of the annuity tax for the support of the Established Church clergy, and that its terms will not be so favourable for their pecuniary interests as was the compromise which was lost at the close of last session owing to the timidity of the clergyman in London who represented his northern brethren. Should the measure be agreed to, as he is not without hope, the Established Church will be virtually disestablished in Edinburgh. He also stated that he means to persevere with his measure for abolishing church rates in Scotland, adopting as his model the Act that effected this object in England.

WHAT IS SAYING ON CHURCH MATTERS.

A letter in the Inquirer, with the well-known signature "S. S.," shows in its true light the position of those who maintain that, in regard to the Articles by which he is bound, and the Creeds which he professes to believe, the clergyman "is only accountable morally to those persons to whom he is accountable legally." The writer justly says:

"This is taking a very limited view of the question, though I fear it agrees with the opinion held by most of the clergy themselves. They are appointed to their office by the Government of the country, and required thereupon to make several solemn vows; and the Government, speaking through the judges of the land, allows them to interpret these vows very laxly. But this is a case in which, though the Government and the clergyman are the two parties who are in the first instance concerned with how far these solemn promises are kept, they are by no means the only parties. Another party very much concerned is the congregation, whom the clergyman every Sunday teaches to believe the Creeds and the doctrines implied in the Liturgy, while he himself at the same time solemnly declares his own belief in them. In fact, the so-called 'liberal' clergyman is deceiving his congregation every Sunday when he reads the service in church. It is a very poor excuse for him to say that in the Gorham case, and in the case of Williams and Wilson, he has received permission from the Privy Council so to do. A man of tender conscience would hold that he must not so deceive and so mislead, though he has had legal permission to do so. As a Minister of State lately declared, the morality of the whole nation is tainted by the spectacle. While the ministers of religion have so little regard to these solemn engagements, how can we expect tradesmen to be honest? Instead of praising the 'liberality' of the Broad Church, let us praise the honesty and sincerity of Mr. Sedley Taylor and Mr. Auberger Herbert, who have both lately resigned their fellowships rather than hold them with a profession of belief in the unintelligible and contradictory Creeds and Articles of the Church of England."

The Rev. W. C. Plunket, treasurer of St. Patrick's Cathedral, in an address at Belfast on the "Nationality of the Irish Church," expressed his dissent pretty plainly from the opinion of those who were for maintaining her as a branch merely of the English Church, and "tying her inexorably to a rigid conformity to the doctrine, discipline, and worship" of that Church. They should strike root for themselves. Of the appointment of bishops he asked, "Even admitting the risks of popular election, and the reason we have at present to be well satisfied with our Crown-appointed bishops, has State patronage been always a blessing to the Church? Is there no way of improving upon the system of episcopal election adopted in other free Churches except the placing of those appointments in the hands of the Minister of the day, to be manipulated according to the exigencies of political diplomacy? Surely our Church has been too long the tool of party to make us wish for such a result. Why should we go beyond our own country to look for the wisdom and learning required for a judicial committee? And why should we train up our clergy to long after the flesh-pots of Anglican preferment when, if there be any special duty to be urged upon them, it is their duty as patriots to stand by their National Church in the hour of her peril? Why should we assume that a declaration of our dependency on the English Church and a compulsory conformity to her doctrines, discipline, and worship is the only way of preserving ourselves from extravagance and disintegration?" The speech was loudly cheered.

The Church Herald makes a statement from which it would seem as if Romanism was getting a little saucy:

"We know that several members of the Anglican Communion have, in consequence of the recent decision of the Privy Council in the Macdonochie case, sought refuge in the Roman Church, but the Roman clergy are in no hurry to receive them, and in several cases have refused to do so until the candidates shall have had sufficient time to consider the steps they wish to take."

The Guardian informs us that "the High Church party at last have taken a leaf out of the books of the Evangelicals and Dissenters, and have brought out a penny paper, or rather broadsheet, not unlike the British Workman, only without illustrations. It is called the Gospellet: it is roughly printed, in rather large type, and on thick paper."

In the "Life of Dr. Robert Lee," of Edinburgh, we meet with the following testimony to the respect which our faith has won on the north side of the Tweed:—"Unitarianism has never been strong in Scotland, but its preaching has always been intellectual and interesting to educated men." We trust that it will continue to be so, while at the same time it more and more attracts the people by its spirit of freedom and love.

In connection with this, it may be mentioned that a correspondent of the Spectator, after stating that there are several ministers beyond the Border who preach Broad Church principles, says: "The old, narrow Calvinism has been attacked in its strongholds. A new and altogether different spirit is abroad in the land. It is now quite a common thing to hear members of the Presbyterian Churches call themselves 'Universalists.'"

In reply to the letter of Mgr. Dupanloup (which, by the way, affords a curious illustration of the constant unity which prevails in the Romish Church), Mgr. Dechamps, the Ultramontane Archbishop of Mechlin, asks, "Is it not true that Jesus Christ preached nothing in the Gospel with greater love and with greater richness of expression than those two dogmas, which may be called the Heart and the Head of the Church: the dogma of the Blessed Eucharist, and the dogma of the Sovereign power, that of the infallibility of Peter?" Of course we cannot tell what the reply of the Bishop of Orleans to his catechetical brother would be, but if the question were put to us, we should answer with a courteous, but decided "No!"

From the way in which the word "God" is often used by orthodox writers, we are sometimes led to think that they must attach to it totally different ideas from what we do. We have an instance in last Friday's Record, which, in a leader on Christmas-day, speaks of "the nativity of God!" We thought that He was "without beginning of days." In the same article, the festival is described as "a tribute of acknowledgment to the beneficent work schemed in eternity, but then actually commenced in time!" To us this has a heathenish sort of flavour.

That sad "Sadducean," the Pall Mall, as the Record calls it, says:

"The church newspapers display at this season of peace and good-will the Christian charity for which they are usually distinguished. The Rock denounces the Bishop of London for his objections to religious journalism, terms the Ritualists Dr. Manning's 'jackals,' and the disestablishment of the Irish Church an 'iniquitous measure.' The Church Herald, in allusion to Dr. Temple's consecration, declares that 'the shadow of the dark deed falls upon the crib of Bethlehem, that 'the craven consecrators have rendered themselves contemptible in the eyes both of papists and infidels,' and that 'these wretched betrayers of their faith have their brief day, and pass away to their appointed places'—a periphrastic way, no doubt, of expressing a very strong fact indeed. The same journal attributes the credulity of the Welsh, as exhibited in the case of the fasting girl, to the influence of Dissent. The Church News, which observes, by the way, that the worldliness and wickedness in the country are due to Protestantism, is comparatively free from evil speaking. So also is the Church Times, which satisfies itself by a repudiation of the bishops, a sneer, not undeserved, at the 'undisciplined hot-headedness' of Archdeacon Denison, and a remark, the truth of which is not to be disputed, that as Churchmen, whose lot is cast in the nineteenth century, it is not their good fortune to enjoy 'peace on earth.' Finally, the John Bull is eager to inform us that the opposition to Dr. Temple will not cease with his consecration, that his right to hold a seat in Convocation will be questioned, that many bishops will decline to unite with him in committees, and that no lapse of time can make him a rightful bishop. Evidently the good-will towards men proclaimed in our churches at Christmas is not intended to include ecclesiastical opponents."

THE PAPAL POWER.

ONE of the prerogatives to which the popes now pretend is the power of summoning general councils and presiding in them. But all the general councils within the first five centuries were summoned by the emperors. Leo I. joined with many other bishops in requesting the Emperor Theodosius to summon a council in Italy, but he refused, because he had before appointed one in Ephesus. Nor did the popes, or their legates, preside in general councils in early times; but various other bishops presided in them; and in the first general council—namely, that of Nice—Constantine himself was the principal moderator or director. Speaking to the bishops upon that occasion, he said, "Ye are bishops of things within the church, but I am bishop as to externals."

It was some time before the popes thought of claiming absolute infallibility, as the successors of an infallible apostle. The first pope who seems to have made this claim was Agatho, who, in an epistle to the sixth general council, held at Constantinople in 680, said that the Church of Rome never erred, nor can err in any point; and that all the constitutions of the Church of Rome ought to be received as if they had been delivered by the divine voice of St. Peter.

As the Christians affected the ceremonies of the heathen worship, the popes were ready enough to avail themselves of it, when it might add to their personal dignity. Accordingly as the office of Pontifex Maximus had been of great dignity in Rome, and had generally been assumed by the emperors, from the end of the fourth century the bishops of Rome were often called Pontiffs, and their office the Pontificate.

The ceremony by which respect is generally shown to the pope is kissing his toe, which was also done to the Pontifex Maximus of heathen Rome, and was demanded by Domitian, Dioclesian, and some others of the emperors who were likewise chief pontiffs. This civility was first shown to pope Constantine I., at beginning of the eighth century, by the emperor Justinian II., at Nicodemia. He did it out of voluntary respect, but it was afterwards claimed as a right even from crowned heads.

The custom of carrying the pope on men's shoulders after his election, which seems to have been borrowed from the custom of some of the northern nations, in the choice of their chiefs or princes, was first used by Stephen II., about the middle of the eighth century. He also had his bulls or edicts sealed with lead.

Afterwards the popes proceeded to assume other titles and forms, not only of royalty, but even of divinity; which having been first assumed by the princes of the East, were from them adopted by the Roman emperors, and from them by the popes.

So early as the fourth century the bishops of Rome surpassed all their brethren in riches and splendour, which exceedingly dazzled the common people; and so great a prize being contended for, there were often great tumults in Rome on the election of a pope, attended sometimes with murder and violence of all kinds. Many were killed on both sides in 368, during the contest between Damasus and Ursinius.

Notwithstanding the power assumed by the popes, and though in many things they acted independently of the emperor, and even opposed him, they were still his subjects, and upon some occasions he treated them as such. The election of the Bishop of Rome was not deemed valid without the consent of the emperor, and Justinian deposed two popes. When the empire of the Lombards was entirely put an end to in Italy, the nomination of the popes, at least the right of confirming them, was still in the hands of the temporal princes. Adrian, with his whole synod, acknowledged this power in Charlemagne, and Gregory VII. was himself confirmed in the papacy by that very emperor whom he afterwards deposed.

In early times the bishops of Rome, like those of other cities, were chosen by the people, as well as by the clergy. The first considerable innovation that was made in this respect at Rome was at a council held in 1059, under Nicholas II., when it was ordered that, upon the decease of a pope, the cardinal bishops should first consider of a proper person to succeed; that they should then consult with their cardinal clergy; and also the people should give their consent. But Alexander III., in the middle of the twelfth century, established the sole right of election in the College of Cardinals.

After this time the term Cardinal was confined to the seven bishops within the territory and city of Rome, who had been used to consecrate the Roman pontiff, and to the presbyters of the twenty-eight Roman parishes or principal churches. To appease the tumults that were made by others of the clergy, he, or some of his successors, for it is uncertain, made the chief of them cardinal deacons, giving them also votes in the election. Lucius III. was the first pope that was chosen by cardinals only. The particular rules that are now observed in the election of a pope were settled in 1178.

I may just add that the almost universal custom of the popes changing their names upon their election began with Bocco di Porco, in 844, who took that of St. Sergius, his original name (signifying Pig's Mouth) being thought unsuitable to his dignity.

A play on the name of the present pope was made before his election, thus: "Pio? No, no ma stai Feretti?" (Pius? No, no! but remain Feretti). R. E.

AMERICAN NOTES.

The Monthly Journal of the American Unitarian Association, which has been just ten years in existence, and well fulfilled its aim, has appeared for the last time. It, however, merely gives way for another Monthly which, it is hoped, will do its work and more—with a larger aim and a broader scope. We entirely agree with the Editor of the Journal that this "is no time for silencing, or even for lowering the tone of our denominational utterances, but rather for proclaiming, more clearly and emphatically, our distinctive position." But the feeling has for some time been growing among our best men in the States that, owing to the multiplication of magazines, there was none which did full justice to the admitted literary ability of the denomination, and that it was desirable somewhat more to concentrate their efforts, and unite in producing a Review which, while the expositor of Unitarianism, might address itself to the great body of the American people, "bringing forward subjects of the highest social and religious importance under the inspiration of the Christian religion, interpreted in a Liberal Theology." This has led to the discontinuance, not only of the Journal, but the Christian Examiner; and their place is to be taken by Old and New. It is to be edited by the Rev. E. E. Hale, than whom no one, we imagine, could be found more likely to gather around him a staff of writers who will make it interesting and attractive. The first number contains a paper on the Ecumenical Council by a gentleman who was formerly a member of one of the religious orders, but left Europe because he found the Church false to freedom. Dr. Bellows contributes some of his experiences in Egypt; Dr. Clarke an article on the Perfection of Jesus; and Robert Collyer one in his own characteristic style. We give a hearty welcome to Old and New, and trust it will meet with abundant success.

We have always credited our American cousins with a large stock of ingenuity, but we confess we were not aware of its real extent, if a statement of Wendell Phillips's is to be relied upon. He says a Yankee baby of ten months looks over the side of his cradle, plans a new one, and gets up and patents it before he is twelve months old. This seems to us a little too precocious, but then, we know, we are considered rather "slow."

According to the New York Post, petitions are being prepared, asking the Pennsylvania Legislature to re-enact the Ten Commandments, the people, so far as the conduct of a good many shows, having forgotten their existence.

Four or five months ago a letter was published from one of the twelve apostles of the Mormon Church, in reply to some statements made by Vice-President Colfax in a speech delivered in August last at Salt Lake City. This has called forth a rejoinder from him in which he maintains and defends his former position. He shows that polygamy is expressly condemned by the Mormon Bible, and by "the Doctrines and Covenants," though it was sanctioned thirteen years later by a pretended revelation. He contends that revelation cannot be permitted to be set up as a defence of what is morally wrong. And as a case in point he holds out the example of England in suppressing the Indian practice of suttee as one worthy to be followed. In connection with his article, it is significant that a bill has been introduced into the Senate, of which Mr. Colfax is President, for giving effect to the Anti-Polygamy Act, which, though on the American Statute Book since 1862, has never been put in force. In a conversation with Senator Trumbull last summer, Brigham Young declared that, if an attempt were made to put this Act into execution, he would resist to the uttermost. But the Vice-President professes not to contemplate the employment of armed force. His doctrine is that the moral power of Congress will be sufficient, when backed up by the firmly declared will of the people to remove "this stain on the national escutcheon."

The Rev. Harry Jones, of whose letters from America we have more than once availed ourselves, in his last gives some interesting particulars regarding the "aspect of religion" there, from which we cull a few.

He was not "prepared to find such strong evidences of popular respect for religion as met him everywhere." He found them not only in the city and the country, but in the forest, the steamboat, and the railway station. The Californian steamboat had a notice full of godly advice to young men posted in the saloon. When he bought a sleeping-car ticket at Sacramento for his long journey eastward across the continent, the clerk, on learning that he was a clergyman took him to task for travelling in a train in which he would have to spend the Sunday. And "this was far from being a solitary instance of similar punctiliousness." "Indeed," he says, "a clergyman using the simple natural freedom of an English Christian must expect to find Americans sometimes provokingly exacting when he travels in their country. Again and again I came across phases of religious severity which were strikingly importunate, if not always radically matured. There is a sort of tartness, like that of unripe fruit, in some growths of American religion. The old Puritan stock still bears strong crops, and spiritual food is frequently given before it has time to mellow." There is no body corresponding to a national Church; and, of course, the term "Dissenter or Non-conformist" is unknown. Churches and religious parties, Mr. Jones thinks, are more sharply defined than with us—the boundaries of opinion more distinct; there is very little that corresponds to Broad Churchism; churches expect their members to think in unison; majorities rule, and minorities, if dissatisfied, must go elsewhere, and found communities after their own liking,—yet this does not produce intolerance. As an Anglican clergyman, his testimony on this point is important. All the Churches, except the Romish, hold some friendly relations; they receive members from one another, and their ministers frequently unite in the prosecution of a common object. The exception to this brotherhood among the Protestant communions, if there is one, is that of his own Church. "I have reason to believe that the 'Episcopal' takes a more exclusive attitude than other Protestant Churches." His witness on another point is equally candid and valuable:—"The American Church in the largest sense is a congeries of religious republics which have no permanent federation. Each being, however, as it were, a republic, wide religious provision is made for the masses of the people. There is little in America corresponding to the provision of the means of Divine worship for the 'poor' of which we hear in England. I have heard this brought as a charge against American Churches. But the real answer, to speak generally, is that there are few 'poor,' as we understand the word." The churches, he adds, are "in the main self-seeding;" and even in the matter of raising money for Church purposes, he evidently feels that the American plan is the best. The people collect the money and do the work. They build the little wooden churches in every village. "Here the parson begs and scrapes to get a church or school built. There he looks out of the window and sees the thing done without his moving a finger." This says something, surely, for the power of the voluntary principle when left to itself.

Mr. Jones confesses that he did not like divers of the services in the Episcopal Church. He "was sometimes struck to the backbone by their coldness." "At one church," he says, "where I assisted in the service, on being asked some question afterwards in the vestry, I could not help saying that I thought the Te Deum rather long. It was very elaborately sung, one young lady taking a prominent solo part. 'Te Deum!' said the rector; 'it is what I call Te-dious.'" "One thing," Mr. Jones observes, "which struck me in almost all the congregations I saw was the large, in some instances very large, proportion of men present. The defect in responding does not, I believe, arise from indifference to the service, but rather from the silence, which is a striking feature of American gatherings. Religion there is an eminently pressing—nay, sometimes importunate matter of general public concern, and men do not leave its observances to be attended by what have been called 'bonnets and babies.' The man element is very conspicuous." After mentioning that the churches which he saw were exceedingly comfortable, he adds:

"The best sermons, or at least those which I thought best, were in Presbyterian and Congregationalist places of worship. But what I think surprised me most was the 'orthodoxy' of sentiments I heard in a Unitarian and Universalist church. In the latter, where there was a magnificent congregation with a large proportion of men, the minister laid down the doctrine of the Atonement with a minuteness of severe detail which would have satisfied the most exacting upholder of the dogma of vicarious suffering. In another—a non-Episcopalian church—I really cannot say to what denomination it belonged—I heard I think the driest, boniest sermon I ever listened to, and that is saying much. The preacher was discoursing on the verse in the 6th chapter of St. John, 'Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of Man, &c.' He said, 'This cannot be understood literally, for such a supposition would offend the best feelings of propriety.' The congregation looked as if especially accessible to such an appeal. The most magnificent sermon I heard was by a black minister in a negro Baptist church."

While the Episcopal Church is influential, and has a large proportion of the educated classes among its members, it stands low in regard to numbers, the Methodist and Baptist Churches counting five or six for its one.

The clergy generally would not be considered by Englishmen clerical in their appearance; and the rector of an eminent Episcopal church was seen by Mr. Jones wearing a black neck-tie while officiating on Sunday. Still, he says, "it struck me that clergymen are treated with great respect in America. I have, unasked, had an abatement made in the price of an article because I was a clergyman. Some railways carry ministers free, and I was told it was not an unusual thing for a company to present a bishop with a free pass over all its lines. Indeed, I was advised myself always to mention my cloth in taking a ticket, as 25 per cent. would be deducted from its price. . . . As a rule the clergy are far from being ill-paid. In some cases congregations even meet the expenses of a tour when their minister is in need of exceptional rest, and provide funds for a substitute while he is away. Americans do not grudge their clergy liberal stipends when they like them, but an unpopular man feels his unpopularity in a material sense."

RETROSPECTIVE AND PROSPECTIVE.

LOOKING back over the wide fields of interest with which our journal is concerned, there are many items in the history of the past year to cheer and encourage us. Year by year, now, we note the ripening of public opinion on the great questions of religious liberty, and if here and there are signs of popular re-action towards a party which in the past has been the opponent of all progressive measures it is not a sign of any real reversal in the tide of national feeling, but only of the degree in which that party has itself moved on with the age. But the past year will be remarkable for something more than the quiet signs of progress with which we have been long familiar. Like 1832 and 1846, the year 1869 will stand prominent in history as one of the great red-letter years of progress. The abolition of the Irish Establishment will take its place with the Reform Bill and the Repeal of the Corn Laws as one of the conspicuous landmarks of our modern history. And as each of these two great measures was not only the completion of a long-fought struggle, but the opening of a new era on the one hand for England's political, and on the other for her commercial policy, so there are many signs that Mr. Gladstone's victory of the past year will be fraught with infinitely greater results than those which it directly contemplated. It has given an impetus to the spirit of religious freedom; it has struck a heavy blow at all merely ecclesiastical denomination. There is not a question touching the relations of the Churches to each other and the attitude of the State in relation to them all, which it will not help to a speedier solution. Already we see signs of this in the great question of the opening of the Universities. The feeling of the nation has so palpably moved on in relation to this matter that the compromises for which once we pleaded in vain are no longer listened to, and hardly even proposed. The Universities themselves are taking the alarm as some of their ablest men throw up their fellowships from conscientious motives, and many more refuse to go in for them. And, though on the great question of the placing of all churches in England upon one absolute level—such as that on which they will henceforth stand in Ireland—there are signs of a rallying to the Church's rescue, yet we have learned too well the lesson of past struggles and the value of the "No-Surrender" cry to have any fear as to what will be the result of the conflict.

Narrowing our view to the past and future of our own group of Liberal Christian churches, though there are no such conspicuous gains to mark our progress, we believe that progress has been steady and sure. Little perceptible in the statistics of our own organisations, it is encouragingly visible in the progress of those thoughts and views which give us our existence as a separate denomination, and which are far more to us than any sectarian aggrandisement. It is impossible to look at the kind of questions which are being debated in all the Churches—at the strong position which the advanced thinkers in every Church unfailingly obtain, if they are manly and earnest in their course and have a living faith—not mere negations, to preach without perceiving that the tide of thought is plainly setting in the direction of those truths and of broader and more practical views of religion, for which through generations past our churches bore their lonely and little-noticed witness. And though this being the case, and the old landmarks of theology being everywhere shifted or overthrown, our own separate churches do not increase as much as we desire, yet we find many signs of encouragement in their generally quickened spirit and activity, while in numbers also they are undoubtedly steadily advancing. One of our contributors has indeed given in another article expression to the feeling of regret and loss which is unavoidable in counting over our death-roll for the year. And yet even on this score we feel no discouragement. To take the places of our honoured men passing one by one from our midst, we may indeed have none who at the moment are their equals; but we believe that amongst the younger generation are men, in increasing rather than diminished numbers, as rich in promise, alike for the intellectual and religious future of our churches, as were these greater men in their own younger days. And though the calculable sources of ministerial supply seem—though not more than they have done any time these hundred years—insufficient, yet from one source or another men do spring up, and we are convinced that the ministry of the present is as strong in intellect and piety as the ministry of the past has been at any period since the Act of Toleration.

In any case the remedy is clear. It is for our laity to make the life of our churches a worthier, more encouraging thing; for our ministers to make our ministry a manifestly noble work; such a work as may attract—as true, devoted service in a glorious cause always will attract—the stronger men of the younger generation to it.

On the whole, therefore, we close the year without any feeling of discouragement, and enter on the new year hopefully. For ourselves, in our humble journalistic labours, we can only say that we shall do what in us lies in the future, as we have done in the past, to stimulate our churches to more earnest, generous, brotherly, and intelligent life, and to help on every great movement of the day by which human life may be elevated and sanctified, and this England of ours won to be the kingdom of God and of his Christ.

THE YEAR—ITS LOSSES AND THEIR LESSONS.

FOR our own church, this has been a sad year. It has been a year, unparalleled in our annals, of losses. We have lost some of our foremost leaders. We all remember with the freshness of a yesterday's experience the grief that fell upon us at the end of May, when the revered Principal of Manchester New College was taken from us, after a service of fifty years. Some of us mourned in him the loss of a master at whose feet we had sat for years, enriched by his copious learning, but most largely blessed by intercourse with his beautiful spirit. Others more numerous had enjoyed the privilege of his friendship, had been used to look on his face and grasp his hand and listen to his voice, and had counted their acquaintance with him among the choicest blessings of their lives. But all the members of all our churches, old, middle-aged, and young, without distinction, those who had never seen Mr. Tayler, as truly as those who knew him well, felt during those closing days of May that they had sustained a personal loss, and grieved as for the bereavement of a dear friend. He embodied within himself so large a portion of our church's life that even its smallest parts missed in his removal almost a fraction of themselves. Nor would it be possible, we think, to find a truer or a worthier embodiment than he of the highest and purest spirit that has yet entered our church. In him were conjoined the profoundest and most reverential trust with the freest and most fearless inquiry, the most complete humility with the most active mind, and the most perfect simplicity with the most varied culture. In short, he was a worthy leader for our church, since he was a fulfilment of its aspirations to unite the spirit of the ancient faith with freedom from the ancient creeds. And now he is dead with the dying year. Few churches could lose such a man without sorely feeling the loss. Indeed, few churches had such a man to lose. But least of all could we, and therefore this is a year to be marked as one of the saddest in our history. Yet but a portion of our cause for sadness is told yet. If we remember those last days of May, and how we mourned for Mr. Tayler, we remember with no less fresh a memory how we heard, when three more weeks had passed, that another name beloved and honoured throughout the length and breadth of our church, for it was the name of him who had done most to foster it everywhere, must be struck off from our earthly muster-roll, for its bearer too was gone. And if we grieved at our first loss, we were smitten as with a staggering blow when it was so rapidly succeeded by the second. We could but pray, like Elisha, for a double portion of their spirit to sustain us in the prosecution of their work. We could but trust in the goodness of the cause in whose service their lives were spent to vindicate itself without them; nor did we need a truer vindication of its goodness than the fairness and nobility of their lives.

But the dying year has registered yet more deaths of men who held an honoured place in our church. The names of Bishop, of Squire, of Malleson, and of Talbot, like those of Tayler and of Aspland, have this year ceased to speak to us of men living in our midst. And there are yet more that we might add, for twelve of our ministers have gone from us in the last twelve months. Nor is this a matter which merely affects us with a sorrow however deep for the loss of men held by us in honour and respect. We are forced to look on and to make the serious inquiry, how can these vacant places be filled up? Have we men to fill them now, and is there a prospect in the advancing years that the inevitable losses which impend over us will be met by corresponding gains? The fact is, as has been shown over and over again, that all our educational institutions together do not send us anything like sufficient men to meet such a death-rate as twelve in a year. This foreshadows a future certainly demanding the serious attention of every one of us. It will not do to trust in Providence to send us a continued supply of those able and earnest men who have come from other churches to do our work. As it is, we are to a large extent dependent on them. We must make efforts we have never made as yet to offer every inducement and encouragement to the best young men amongst us to enter our ministry. It is a vital matter that we should do so. A church, whose ministers are dying twice as fast as they are coming into life, must inevitably decay and dwindle, and at length expire. Let every congregation that loves its own cause and hopes to have a long and vigorous life, strain every nerve to secure its conditions. Let it make the ministerial position such that every earnest religious man, with fair ability, can, by persevering industry, obtain therein an honest living, and maintain a cultivated home for himself and his family. It cannot be expected that parents should recommend their sons to enter a profession wherein the chances are that, unless they are peculiarly fortunate, they will be unable to maintain their position in society, and, most important of all, to educate their children in such a way that they can maintain it after them. But if, on the other hand, there be offered a reasonable prospect of this, with the liberty we give our ministers to act and speak simply as their consciences direct, theirs is surely a position to be coveted by the best and ablest of our children. Accordingly, if an earnest effort is needed, as it unquestionably is, there is little doubt that it would be successful. There have been several good examples set already, and many steps taken in the right direction, but much more has yet to be done to sustain the doubtful fortunes of our church. To put it plainly, our congregations expect their ministers to be gentlemen and their wives to be ladies, and yet they often render it impossible that they should live as such, unless they have an independent income of their own. It may seem that this is a low view to take of a spiritual question; but ministers and their wives and children are human beings with human requirements that must be met, and unless our congregations enable the majority of them to meet these better than at present, they cannot complain of empty pulpits or pulpits inefficiently filled. In addition to its voice of mourning, then, this dying year to us uttereth speech and sheweth knowledge concerning a most urgent necessity for the future of our church, and a most pressing and immediate demand that it rests with all who hold it dear to do their utmost to supply.

Nor let us be the less awake to the necessity because our church's work is being largely done outside our church's walls. That such is the case we cannot fail to rejoice. We serve the truth, and are glad to see the truth prevail by whatever means, and to behold its standard raised aloft by whatever hand. But because the Christianity of England is gradually drifting towards us, is that a reason why we should leave our post? Because other men are proclaiming as new revelations our old principles and cherished beliefs, is that a reason why we should be dumb? Nay; it is rather a reason why we should speak with renewed power and raise our voice throughout the land. People who would not listen will listen now; therefore let us speak to them. We have laboured long in a barren soil, why should we let others enter into our labours just when the soil begins to bear its fruit? Why should we lay down our charge just when the triumph of our cause is approaching? To do so would be unworthy of the departed leaders, who bore the burden and the heat of the long day of unfruitful labour; but we must do so, unless we see that there rise up in larger numbers men like them to fill their places.

THE END OF THE WORLD.

WE trust it does not show an impertinent spirit of curiosity in us, but we must confess we should very much like to know what Dr. Cumming's precise state of feeling is just at present. Assuming the prophet's mantle upwards of twenty years ago, he has gone on solemnly warning us that the inevitable conclusion of this poor planet of ours was certainly come. But the "finally" and "to conclude" was so often repeated that our faith in him as a seer began somewhat to waver, and as from time to time the millennium was postponed, the recollection now and then would cross our minds of his countryman, Caleb Balderstone, who, when the boys were waiting to see the blowing up of the old tower, sent them home to their beds by telling them their Honours had given orders that the event was not to take place till the next day at noon. But in "The Last Woe," the prophet distinctly intimated that we must look for the final consummation somewhere between the autumnal equinox of 1867 and that of 1868; yet here we are at the end of 1869, and still the mad old world goes swinging round in the heavens—or as the Telegraph more sublimely puts it, "steeple-chasing through the infinities"—just as it has done for nobody knows how many thousands of years. We own, as we said, to a little curiosity how the Doctor feels respecting this failure on the part of the globe to accommodate itself, as it clearly ought to have done, to his vaticinations, and explode at the time which he had fixed. We fear he must have been considerably grieved by this fresh proof of its wickedness, more especially after it had raised his hopes by a quick succession of earthquakes, and threatenings of war, and other premonitory signs.

We remember an excellent lady who, about twenty years ago, sat waiting through a whole day for the sounding of the last trumpet, which some reverend Zadkiel had declared was fixed for that particular day, and when the clock struck midnight, and there was no appearance of the earth being about to be abolished, retired to rest in a very uneasy state of mind, and sorely disappointed. Is this, we wonder, the Doctor's condition, or does he still live in hope that the great event which has so often mocked his predictions is near at hand.

It is curious to see how this idea of the world's approaching end has gone on cropping up at various periods. It seems clear that even in the apostolic age there was a prevailing belief in the Church that the Son of Man was about to appear, when old things would pass away and all be made new; and every reader of ecclesiastical history knows that at intervals ever since the same idea has sprung up afresh and taken possession of many minds. Of late these intervals seem to have come more closely together, and a curious psychological study might be found in some of those who have given themselves to millenarian fancies.

In 1794 a singular poem, entitled "Tetelestai," was published by the Rev. David Bradberry on the subject. He believed that the world had then reached "the penult of days," and gives this lively description of what was about to befall it:

"See (pouring from ten thousand splitten rocks,
In hissing Fire, which all description mocks)
Torrents of liquid Flint, surpass
Transparent Flame: Transparent Glass,
The calcin'd Mountain's Side
Spout down, and swiftly glide,
In fiery Floods,
O'er Fields, and Woods,
And reeking Plains."

In the summer of 1826, Crabb Robinson, after taking tea with Irving, puts down in his Diary that he said he believed the millennium would come in less than forty years. Some fourteen or fifteen years ago, a worthy Latter-Day Saint, who felt a kindly interest in our welfare, made a journey of forty miles that he might convert us to his views, and so prepare us to be saved from the fiery deluge which he had no manner of doubt was to sweep over the earth in less than six months. On our venturing to remind him that similar expectations had been held just as firmly by others in times past, "Yes," he quietly said, "those were instigations of the Devil." We were on the point of retorting, "And how do you know that yours are not?" but we felt that this would be rather rude, and that, as it proved, a few months would furnish sufficient answer.

We cannot but wonder, seeing how soon to every one the world will be over, that there should be this anxiety concerning its end. We see no good, but rather harm, likely to arise from the kind of religious fortune-telling in which so many are ready to indulge. It only serves to fill their minds with idle fancies and fears, and draw off their attention from the great present duties of life. The right way to treat millennium-mongers is that in which Theodore Parker and Emerson treated one of them. Meeting the former, he told him "the world was coming to an end next week." "Oh!" he replied, "that don't concern me; I live in Boston." Passing on, he fell in with the latter, and made the same announcement to him. "Well," he said, "let it come to an end; we can get along fully as well without it." For our own part, we are inclined to agree with the Methodist preacher who gave it as his opinion that the world, so far from approaching its end, has not yet got out of its teens. At all events, we feel no doubt whatever that a much surer sign of the coming of Christ than any drawn from the book of Daniel or of Revelation will be, that his spirit of benevolence and love is diffusing itself through the earth, and converting it into a kingdom where all enemies shall be put under his feet, and he shall truly reign.

LAU-TSZE.*

THE Delegates' translation of the New Testament into Chinese renders the opening verse of St. John's gospel by the words: "Yuen che yu TAOU." And this word TAOU (sometimes written tau and tao) is one that has caused as much dispute and has a meaning as indefinite as that for which it is used. The word means the Way, the Word, virtue, reason, the first principle, &c., &c. It has also given a name to one of the Chinese sects, that of the Tauists, who are of almost equal importance in the Middle Kingdom with the disciples of Confucius. Of Lau-Tsze nothing certain is known, and the story of his life has been so surrounded by fabulous matter that even his name is a matter of doubt. Mr. Chalmers translates it by the phrase "Old Philosopher;" but it will also bear the interpretation "Old Child," and in support of this latter might be adduced the legend that, when he was born, he had a "flaxen poll"—his head covered with hair as white as snow. He was born 604 years before the birth of Christ, and died at the ripe old age of 119 years. The wildest legends are narrated of him, which we need not stay now to examine. He has left behind him as a memorial of his genius the Tau Teh King, which may be rendered The Sacred Book of Reason or Virtue.†

This sacred classic of the Tau-kea has been translated into English by the Rev. John Chalmers, M.A., and every one may now study those speculations on the problems of Life and Duty with which the mind of this famous sage was occupied 2,000 years ago. To him also the enigma of Existence presented itself, and with long meditation he found an answer which not for him alone sufficed, but also for thousands of others seeking the solution of this Sphinx question.

The first feeling will be one of disappointment. The mystic language of the Old Scholar leaves us little of his in the shape of sharply defined doctrine. What for instance can be more barren than the opening sentence of the book: "The tau (reason) which can be tau-ed (reasoned) is not the Eternal Tau (Reason). The name which can be named is not Eternal Name."

"Non-existence is named the antecedent of heaven and earth; and Existence is named the mother of all things. In eternal non-existence, therefore, man seeks to pierce the primordial mystery; and, in eternal existence, to behold the issues of the universe. But these two are one and the same, and differ only in name. This sameness (of existence and non-existence) I call the abyss—the abyss of abysses—the gate of all mystery."

We catch no glimpse in Lau-tsze of any belief in a personal deity, for taou is rather the eternal order of nature than a God. It indicates a principle and not a person.

But if his metaphysics, as is sometimes the case with more western writers, are somewhat hazy and unsatisfactory, we find him uttering moral maxims of no ordinary beauty and purity, mixed up with aspirations from which we instinctively recoil. A few specimens of his moral teachings may be given:

"He who knows when he has enough is rich.

"It is better to desist than to go on grasping at fulness. Handling and sharpening cannot last long.

* The Speculations on Metaphysics, Polity, and Morality of the "Old Philosopher," Lau-Tsze. Translated from the Chinese, with an Introduction, by John Chalmers, A.M. London: Trübner and Co.

Julien translates it thus: "Le Livre de la Voie et de la Vertu."

"When gold and gems fill the hall none can protect them.

"Wealth and honour, with pride, bring their own punishment.

"When a work of merit is done and reputation is coming, to get out of the way is the Tau of Heaven."

Here again, in a different form, is the golden rule of Christianity, which Confucius has had the credit of having anticipated, though he was about fifty years younger than Lau-Tsze:

"Recompense injury with kindness.

"The good I would meet with goodness. The not-good I would also meet with goodness. Virtue is good to all.

"The faithful I would meet with faith. The not-faithful I would also meet with faith. Virtue is faithful."

When Confucius was told that Lau-Tsze taught his disciples to recompense evil with good, that worldly sage replied, "Not so, repay kindness for kindness, and justice for evil."

The Old Philosopher speaks wisely of war and capital punishment, and throughout betrays the most vivid opposition to forms of government. Had he been a ruler he would have governed by example alone. Individuality is strongly inculcated: "The sage is himself strictly correct, but does not cut and carve other people. He is chaste, but does not chasten others. He is straight, but does not straighten others. He is enlightened, but does not dazzle others."

Lau-Tsze, like the Christian, looks forward to the time when there shall be peace on earth. This will be when Virtue reigns:

"When the world has Tau (when Tau reigns in the empire), horses are used only for purposes of agriculture.

"When the world has not Tau (when Tau does not reign in the empire), war-horses are bred on the waste common.

"There is no sin greater than giving rein to desire. There is no misery greater than discontent. There is no calamity more direful than the desire of possessing. Therefore the sufficiency of contentment is an everlasting sufficiency."

The Tau Teh King, a collection of wise sayings and moral precepts, amongst other interesting questions, raises that of the possibility of communication between the philosophical schools of India and China. The speculations of the Old Philosopher often remind us of the teachings of Buddha Gautama. This version by one of our most distinguished Chinese scholars will, it is to be hoped, direct the attention of our scholars to this subject.

The practical effects of the teachings of Lau-Tsze appear to have been good, and his followers are noticed for their morality and justice, although some ambiguous phrases of their master have led them far astray in search of the elixir of life and similar chimeras.

At this moment, when all religions are being subjected to the test of scientific inquiry, this book comes very opportunely, and we owe a debt of gratitude to the distinguished scholar who has made it accessible to the English reader. If it is followed by a version of the Book of Pains and Rewards, we shall then be better able to judge of the theology of the Tau-kea. For the present we bid farewell to the Old Philosopher and his disciples.

FIRESIDE READINGS.

ANOTHER YEAR!

ANOTHER page, filled up, we close
Of life's mysterious solemn book,
And, ere to join the past it goes,
Cast over it an anxious look.

What we each day have written there
Now stands unchangeable as fate,
And every line, or dark or fair,
The coming judgment must await.

Alas! as we the page review,
How many careless blots appear
How little that is good and true!
How much to cause us shame and grief!

Ah! would that we had better known
The worth of every fleeting day,
And made the treasures all our own
Which at our feet they came to lay

Another year! perchance our last!

O Father, make us truly wise,
That so the coming days, when past,
May not call forth sad tears and sighs!

CHILDREN'S SAYINGS.

In a little volume, by Mr. John Neal, entitled "Great Mysteries," there is an amusing chapter on "Children." We give a few of the things which he tells us he has heard or overheard.

I once knew a little boy, who, after sitting awhile as if lost in thought, turned to his mother, and said: "Mother! what did you marry my father for? Why didn't you wait till I grew up and then marry me?" Rather a strange question, to be sure, and the little fellow was but just old enough to put his words together. But compare it with many a question put by the sages of earth. Consider it side by side with the ponderings and the misgivings, the inquisitiveness and the apprehensions of a great philosopher, when he interrogates the Builder of the universe, and sets himself in array, face to face, with Jehovah. Nay, I have heard a very intelligent person of mature age betray a confusion of thought altogether as laughable as that of the poor boy. She had been to see a captious old lady whom her father, in his youth, had once intended to marry. "And how did you like her?" said I. "Not at all," she replied; "Oh, you don't know how glad I am that father did not marry her; I never should have liked her, I am sure." As if, marry whom he might, she must have been born, she herself, with precisely the same preferences, prejudices and opinions!

I remember a little boy who was a lexicographer from his birth, a language-master and a philosopher. From the hour he was able to ask for a piece of bread and butter, he never hesitated for a word, not he! If one wouldn't serve, another would, with a little twisting and turning. He assured me one day, when I was holding him by the hand rather tighter than he wished (he was but just able to speak at the time), that I should choke his hand; at another, he came to me all out of breath, to announce that a man was below shaving the wall. Upon due inquiry, it turned out that he was only whitewashing. But how should he know the difference between whitewash and lather, a big brush and a little one? Show me, if you can, a prettier example of synthesis or generalisation, or a more beautiful adaption of old words to new purposes. I have heard another complain of a school-fellow for winking at him with his lip; and he took the affront very much to heart, I assure you, and would not be pacified till the matter was cleared up. Another, now at my elbow, hardly five, has just been prattling about the handle of a pin, meaning the head; and I never shall forget his earnestness about what he called the necklace of the gate—a heavy iron chain with a large weight swinging to it, which a wood-sawyer had forgotten to replace after finishing his work. It is but yesterday that a little boy, being asked by an elder sister in my presence what a widow was—he had been talking about a widow—replied, A poor woman that goes out a-washing. What better definition would you have? At home or abroad, is not the poor widow always a-washing—now the floors of a wealthier neighbour, and the clothes of somebody who happens not to be a widow—and now with her own tears the face of her little baby, that lies half asleep and half sobbing in her lap?

Other children talk about the bones in peaches—osteologists are they; and others, when they have the toothache, aver that it burns them. Of such is the empire of poetry. I have heard another give a public challenge in these words to every child that came near, as she sat upon the doorstep with a pile of tamarind-stones, nutshells, and pebbles lying before her: "Ah! I've got many-er than you!" That child was a better grammarian than Lindley Murray; and her wealth, in what was it unlike the hoarded and useless wealth of millions?

Not long ago, while passing through a narrow, unfrequented street, my attention was attracted by two little girls at play together; one a perfect tomboy, with large laughing eyes, and a prodigious quantity of hair; the other a little timid creature, altogether too shy to look up as I passed. The romp was balancing her body over the gate, and the little prude was looking at her. On the opposite side of the way were two smart-looking boys, whom I did not observe till I heard a sweet, clear voice at my elbow saying—almost singing, indeed—"I'll give oo a kith if oo want one!" I stopped and heard the offer repeated by the shy-looking puss, while the romp stared at her with her mouth wide open, and the boys cleared out with a laugh, being too shame-faced to profit by the offer. Verily, verily, men are but children of a larger growth—and women, too.

Not many years ago, another was caught in a mill; they stopped the machinery, and took the wheel to pieces, but it was an hour and a half before they could free her entirely. During this time she threw her arms about her father's neck, and kissing him, whispered: "Am I dead, papa?" She died within two hours after she was liberated. One might almost expect to see ringlets of purple and gold, budding before death, from between the shoulders of such a child.

The reasoning of the little creatures, too, is always delightful; and if you are good-natured enough to follow them through their own little demonstrations, without insisting upon the language of a syllogism, always conclusive. Take one example in proof: A child but three years of age, unperceived by its mother, followed her down into the cellar, and, when its mother returned, was left there. By-and-by the little thing was missed; inquiries were made in every quarter; the whole neighbourhood was alarmed; the well searched, the hen-house, the barn, the very pigsty; but all in vain. At last, somebody had occasion to go into the cellar, and there, upon the bottom step of the stairs, the little creature was found, sitting by herself, as still as death, and purple with cold. Half frantic with joy, the mother snatched her up, and, running to the fire with her, asked her why she did not cry. "I toudn't, ma," was the reply, "I toudn't, ma—it war tho dark!" After all, now, was not that a capital reason?—was it not the truth? How many are there who cannot, or will not cry, even to their Father above, because it is so dark!

A PLAN IN SEASON.

THE Vicar of Uttoxeter describes his success in establishing "penny dinners" in his parish. "Three tins of Australian mutton, costing 10s. 6d., boiled in a copper with potatoes, turnips, and carrots, and thickened with pea flour, rice, or pearl barley, make capital Irish stew, sufficient for 120 dinners; and they are so appreciated that we cannot make them fast enough."

A LIE STICKS.

A LITTLE newsboy, to sell his paper, told a lie. The matter came up in Sabbath-school.

"Would you tell a lie for three cents?" asked a teacher of one of her boys.

"No, ma'am," answered Dick, very decidedly.

"For ten cents?"

"No, ma'am."

"For a dollar?"

"No, ma'am."

"For a thousand dollars?"

Dick was staggered. A thousand dollars looked big. Oh, would it not buy lots of things! While he was thinking another boy behind him cried out, "No, ma'am."

"Why not?" asked the teacher.

"Because, when the thousand dollars are gone, and the things you've got with them are gone too, the lie is there just the same," answered the boy.

Ah, yes! That is so. A lie sticks. Everything else may go, but that will stay, and you will have to carry it round with you whether you will or not, a hard and heavy load.—Detroit Post.

THE DISCONTENTED WEED.

A WEED grew beside the garden wall, and was so surrounded by its humble friends it could not see a foot beyond.

"Ugh! how choked and smothered up I am," she said, "among these common things. How I should like to rise in the world, and see a little of life. I won't stay here always in this dingy corner," and she spurned the lowly companions at her feet, with a contemptuous toss and flutter.

"Better be content where you are, sister," said the modest little chickweed, the very lowliest of them all, as she spread out her hundred white crystal cups to catch the morning dew. "We have food enough, and home-work enough to keep us busy and happy, if we only do it well. Depend upon it, a high position like the one you aspire to will expose you to a thousand dangers. Be content to bide with us."

But the proud weed scorned such sound advice, and selfishly gathered together all the nourishment she could get, no matter who else might starve. She would have enough to satisfy her silly ambition, no matter what came of it. So she sent out her little rootlets far and near, and undermined or crept over the lawful possessions of her neighbours, until she grew so robust and tall she quite looked over all their heads. She could not climb, like the vine, but she begged one and another to lend her a helping hand, and now it was a weed and now it was a chink of the wall she leaned upon, until, at last, she had reached the base of the highest stone. Here she could look down, at her pleasure, on all her "low-born" friends, as she chose to style them; but, better far, she caught a glimpse, in the early sun-rays, of the sweet banks of roses, and lilies, and violets, in the garden-beds beyond her. Now she had a chance to see something of life, as she had longed to do. But do you think the sight gave her pleasure? No, she had gained her height in a wrong way. All she saw only filled her with envy, and the next most natural thing was to feel spiteful towards all this beauty.

"What a coarse creature that rose must be, to use so much perfume! Ugh! it is enough to overcome one of delicate nerves. What a die-away look that lily has beside her. I suppose she thinks such languishing airs are very becoming; but indeed, if I was not well enough to sit up, I would go to sleep in the grass, and not make myself so conspicuous. Of all the pokes I ever saw that violet beats them hollow; and what frights those painted tulips make of themselves!"

So she passed her ill-natured remarks on everything she saw, not even failing, with her sharp, bold eye, to pick out some spots in the sun himself. There is no telling how far her evil temper might have carried her, but just at that moment the gardener was passing by with his hoe in his hand.

"Dear me," he said, "how these weeds do grow in a single night!" With that he made a dash at the silly thing with his hoe, and quickly destroyed her, root and branch.

Never try to rise by pulling others down. No one thinks better of a child for telling how bad her playmates are. If God has made you a little chickweed at the foot of a rose-bush, be content to delve and thrive as a chickweed should, and be assured that the Great Gardener will be best pleased with you as you are. The botanist, too, will think you a greater prize for his herbarium than the gayest tulip that ever grew.

Remember, that there is nothing so fair and lovely that a spiteful tongue cannot say something against it, but usually such poisoned shafts come back home, doing no harm except to the hand that shot them.

WHO SHALL ROLL AWAY THE STONE?

E. W. MOON.

THAT which weeping ones were saying

Eighteen hundred years ago,
We, the same weak faith betraying,
Say in our sad hours of woe.

Looking at some trouble lying
In the dark and dread unknown,
We, too, often ask with sighing,
"Who shall roll away the stone?"

Thus, with care our spirits crushing,
When they might from care be free,
And, in joyous song out-gushing,
Rise in rapture, Lord, to Thee.
For, before the way was ended,
Oft we've had with joy to own,
Angels have from heaven descended,
And have rolled away the stone.

Many a storm-cloud sweeping o'er us,
Never pours on us its rain;
Many a grief we see before us,
Never comes to cause us pain.
Ofttimes in the feared "to-morrow"
Sunshine comes—the cloud has flown!
Ask not, then, in foolish sorrow,
"Who shall roll away the stone?"

Burden not thy soul with sadness;
Make a wiser, better choice;
Drink the wine of life with gladness;
God doth bid thee, man, "Rejoice."
In to-day's bright sunlight basking,
Leave to-morrow's cares alone;
Spoil not present joys by asking,
"Who shall roll away the stone?"

INTELLIGENCE.

CHRISTMAS TEA PARTIES.—We shall give, the week after next, in one view, such account as we are able of the Christmas school and congregational gatherings reported to us. We shall be glad, therefore, if our correspondents will especially single out for brief mention those features in their entertainments which are most exceptional, and therefore likely to be of most general interest.

BOLTON: BANK-STREET.—In an address which the Rev. Jeffrey Worthington has just issued to his congregation, he states that somewhat exceeding £4,000, exclusive of a conveyance to the chapel trustees of the building formerly known as the Seven Stars Inn, by Mrs. Heywood, with a view to its being available for school purposes, has been raised for building new schools; and besides, among the subscriptions is one from the trustees of the late Alderman Heywood of £500. In addition, the trustees of the late Mr. Heywood have presented £100 to each of the following institutions:—British and Foreign Unitarian Association, East Lancashire Unitarian Mission, Manchester New College, the Unitarian Home Missionary Board, and the Bank-street Day Schools.

DUNDEE.—The building committee have accepted offers made by several tradesmen to complete the new church, and operations will be begun immediately. It is hoped the foundation stone will be laid in February. The church is intended to seat upwards of four hundred persons. The basement will contain two schools, the walls of which will be fourteen feet high. The erection of this church cannot but add to our strength in this district.

EXETER.—On Sunday evening the Rev. T. W. Chignell delivered a lecture on Education, taking as his text, "Inasmuch as ye did it unto one of the least of these ye did it unto me." He gave an outline of what he conceived to be the great needs of the time in the matter of education, and showed that these wants were what the proposals of the Education League recognise and endeavour to meet. He would not, indeed, say that every one ought to join that League, but he made a very earnest appeal that every one should be interested and active on this great question.

MOSSLEY.—On Saturday, Dec. 25th, the annual school tea party was held, presided over by the Rev. D. Berry. More than 600 people were present. A most encouraging report as to the condition of the school was read by the secretary, Mr. Seth Charlesworth: total number of scholars 404, an increase of 43 during the year, with an increase in the average attendance of 12; and the connected institutions—viz., the young men's Bible class, mutual improvement society, band of hope, and band of faith, are all in vigorous operation. Suitable sentiments were spoken to by the chairman; Messrs. Buckley and Thomas, of the Home Missionary Board; and George Mitchell, sen., Thomas Moorhouse, and William Lawton, of Mossley.—On Sunday afternoon last, a public oral examination was held, in the presence of parents and friends, upon subjects which had been regularly pursued during the past six months. There were four groups, collectively numbering over 200 scholars, and each managed by its own teacher. The lowest division of girls was examined by Mr. Seth Charlesworth, upon the Life of Christ; the adult girls by Mr. Moorhouse, on the History of the Jews; the junior boys by Mr. S. Whitworth, on the Life of St. Paul; and the adult males by the Rev. D. Berry, upon the Stuart Dynasty. "The questions were put with much spirit, and the answers indicated intelligent comprehension of the subjects. This systematic course of lessons," writes Mr. John Chadwick, of the Manchester District Sunday School Association, "has had a twofold benefit,—in the first place, the teacher has known what he had to teach; and secondly, the scholars felt they must be prepared to learn. Accordingly, the interest being mutual, the active sympathy between teacher and scholar has been well sustained, and the thoughtful and active character of aims so identical has encouraged the teachers to extend the scheme, so that even the capabilities of the youngest may be systematically worked during the next half-year. The attendance has been better since the plan was adopted, and the future is still more hopeful. The teachers deserve much credit for the zeal and judgment they put into their work. At the conclusion of the examination, Mr. John Chadwick, the Sunday school visitor, addressed the assembly, and after a few words from Messrs. Wm. Mitchell and Moorhouse, this interesting gathering was brought to a close with singing and prayer.

STOCKTON-ON-TREES.—On the 6th, 7th, and 8th instant, a bazaar was held in aid of the building fund for a new school-room which the teachers have long had in contemplation, which was in every respect a success, and realised about £85. On Sunday, the 19th inst., the Rev. Wm. Elliott gave a discourse on "Eternal Torments," in reply to a sermon by a Wesleyan minister, and to others who had discussed the doctrine in a local paper. The chapel was filled with an attentive congregation.

STROUD.—The Rev. H. Austin's lectures on Unitarianism, lately delivered at Stroud, in Gloucestershire, have created a great sensation in that orthodox town. The Independent minister led the way with a course of sermons; then the Roman Catholic priest, Father Wilberforce, lectured on "God the Son," this was followed by a meeting called of all persons who wished to defend the doctrine of Christ's deity; and next week a special course of week evening sermons on the same subject is to be commenced by the clergy under the guidance of the Bishop of Gloucester.

TO SUNDAY-SCHOOL TEACHERS.

To the Editors.—I should be glad through the Herald to say a word or two to Sunday-school teachers on the improved position in which we all stand at present for carrying on the real religious education of our scholars. The complaint has been—I have heard it from teachers a hundred times—that there were no books exactly suited to their need, easily procurable, cheap, and carrying on religious teaching from the beginning, as elementary books carry on other subjects, such as arithmetic and geography. This complaint can be made no longer. We begin the year with two new little books which seem to me to give us to a very large extent what we have been waiting for—I mean, "The Life of Jesus," by the Rev. J. P. Hopps, and "Outline Lessons from the Life of Christ," by the Rev. Brooke Herford. For my own part I feel exceedingly grateful to Mr. Hopps and Mr. Herford for the valuable aids to our work they have given us. They are just the aids I wanted. I am sure I should have found my work in the Sunday-school much easier and much more efficacious in past years if I could have had such helps. The life of Christ must for us Christians be the great medium of our religious teaching, because that life is the highest and most beautiful picture of the religious spirit in man, and at the same time the highest and most beautiful picture of the God towards whom we wish to draw our children. The two books which I have mentioned present this life in such a way as to enable the young to take it in and receive from it the impressions it is so fitted to convey. For myself, I intend to use them as supplementary to each other. I shall go over with my scholars first the "Life of Jesus," by Mr. Hopps, to give them a general idea of his history; and then I shall begin with Mr. Herford's "Outline Lessons," and go over the same ground by reading, with his explanations, the original words of the story in the Gospels. I have carefully read through the "Outline Lessons," and am very much pleased with the way in which Mr. Herford has performed his work. There are some few things, perhaps, which I should have done differently; but, on the whole, I shall be able to use this little book with gladness. I would recommend my fellow-teachers to procure also Mr. Greg's beautiful little book, "Scenes from the Life of Jesus," of which there has been issued lately a new and improved edition. Teachers will find themselves much assisted by this work in doing what Mr. Herford recommends—bringing out the leading facts of the lessons which he gives in due perspective, and making the lessons graphic and living. Also, "Morning Lessons on Portions of the Gospel," published by the Sunday-school Association, will help them in many passages. Lastly, our own Sunday-school Penny Magazine will give them great help. In the numbers for the last few years they would find most of the parables set forth in simple words and explained, and they would find also illustrations in life, or example, of almost every moral duty of which—especially in the Sermon on the Mount—they will have to speak. I would earnestly impress it upon our teachers, that furnished with all these aids, it is only for them to be true to their work and opportunities in order to make the religious education in our Sunday-schools as satisfactory as it has been unsatisfactory.—Very truly yours,

T. E. POYNTING.
